THE GOLD OF CALIFORNIA.

The Dorado of the early Spanish and English adventurers turns out to have been no fable. It was not the mere vision of their too brilliant and exciteable imaginations. It was a palpable reality. The golden region exists—not in the unsubstantial air, in the Atalantis of Plato, or in the Utopia of Sir Thomas More; but in a country to which ships can sail, and to which living men of this every-day world can resort, and pick up the treasure, that smiles at their feet, and wooes them to clutch it. California the Golden is the bright particular spot on the Earth's surface to which all men's attention is directed. It is a new Holy Land for the votaries of Mammon: pilgrims and devotees resort to it from the remotest corners of the globe. The discovery of its amazing wealth is the crowning event in a year of wonders. The year 1848 began in distress and gloom, and lived the greater part of its life amid turmoil and commotion; but it died amid visions of returning peace, reviving confidence, and illimitable riches. A halo of aurean splendour surrounds its memory. It was thought to have accomplished revolutions enough when it changed the political aspect of Europe; but political revolutions, if the accounts received from America are but half true, were the least important of its deeds. A still greater revolution was destined to be commenced within its time—a golden revolution which shall alter the measure of value throughout the civilised world—make the poor rich, and the rich poor—pay off the debts of nations, and start the world afresh in the career of civilisation.

The first feeling excited in Europe by the reports from California was one of incredulity. But the ampleness, completeness, and multifariousness of the details brought over by every succeeding packet, have gradually diminished the doubts of the men of the Old World; and they are now prepared to believe in any marvels that may be reported of the gold of California. Doubt is no longer possible, in the face of such testimony as is daily received. The wonder is, not that the gold is there, but that it should never have been discovered until now. But while the Old World is wondering, the New World is working. The Anglo-Americans have laid hands upon the magnificent prey. California swarms with treasure-seekers; and there is not a man among them that does not find what he seeks. "The sands of the Pactolus," says a letter from San Blas, on the Gulf of California, "have long ceased to be golden; the mines of Mexico hardly pay the working of them; but in the bed and along the banks of the Sacramento, the virgin ore waits but to be gathered in an abundance at present not to be estimated. Lumps of pure gold have been picked up, each large enough to make a diadem. The man who in the morning possessed no property but his labour, no instrument but his unassisted hands, before night saw himself the owner of more wealth than years of labour in any other country of the world could have procured him, and in a few days he became rich, and, if he chose, independent." The manner in which the treasures of the land were first laid bare to the greedy eyes of civilised men is of a piece with the romance of the whole story. Although the traditions reported by Pizarro and Raleigh showed a knowledge on the part of the aboriginal inhabitants of the American continent of the vast stores of gold that lay scattered in some regions, the Dorado had no fixed locality. The Californian aborigines were too unintelligent to be aware of the wealth at their feet. They saw the shining lumps, but did not know them to be gold; and the missionary establishments, under the superintendence of the Spanish Jesuits, who had a sort of nominal possession of the country, were too scanty, too much confined to the coast regions, and too unenterprising, to light on such good fortune. It remained for the industry of the Anglo-American race to discover and to appropriate the treasure. Wherever Brother Jonathan penetrates, he sets to work.

In the course of the winter of 1847-48, a Captain Sutter, one of the emigrants from the United States, or more probably from the adjacent country of Oregon, built a saw-mill on the south branch of the Sacramento river, known as the American Fork, and constructed a mill-race and dam to supply it. "But when it was completed," says an account in an American journal, "it was found that the 'tail race,' or channel whereby the water used to turn the mill is discharged, was too small. To economise time and trouble, the wheel was 'thrown out of gear,' and the whole body of water in the 'dam' passed through the 'race.' The effect of this current was to make the channel wider and deeper; but it had also an additional effect, never contemplated by the constructor, that of disintegrating the soil, and disengaging several large grains of pure gold. These were seen and recognised soon after by Captain Sutter, to whom they had been pointed out by Mr. Marshall, the contractor for building the mill in question. It is supposed that in the interval that elapsed between this fortunate discovery and its publicity, both gentlemen contrived to amass a very considerable quantity of the precious metal. The secret was, however, soon discovered. Within a few months, hundreds of men, Indian and white, were occupied in exploring the circumjacent country. In the beds of the tributary streams, on the shores of the Sacramento river, in the ravines of the mountain torrents, and actually forming 'part and parcel' of the soil of the plains, gold was found in the most extraordinary abundance and of the finest quality. Some of this gold was 'coarse,' that is to say, in large grains mixed with particles of earth; some of it was combined with quartz, in the manner of lamina or plates, while some of it again was mixed with coarse gravel; but the larger proportion of it was 'virgin,' in pure grains or lumps, which varied in weight from one penny-weight to four ounces, or a quarter of a pound each." At present (says a letter from Monterey, the remarkable details of which give a more vivid idea of the golden mania than any language we could employ)

The people are running over the country and picking it out of the earth here and there. Just as a thousand hogs, let loose in a forest, would root up ground-nuts. Some get eight or ten ounces a day, and the least active one or two. They make the most who employ the wild Indians to hunt for them. There is one man who has sixty Indians in his employ; his profits are a dollar a minute. The wild Indians know nothing of its value, and wonder what the pale-faces want to do with it; they will give an ounce of it for the same weight of coined silver, or a thimbleful of glass beads, or a glass of grog; and white men themselves often give an ounce of it, which is worth, at our Mint, 18 dollars or more, for a bottle of brandy, a box of sods powders, or a plug of tobacco. As to the quantity which the diggers get, take a few facts as evidence:—I know seven men, who worked seven weeks and two days, Sundays excepted, on Feather River; they employed on an average 50 Indians, and got out in these seven weeks and two days 275 pounds of pure gold. I know the men and have seen the gold, and know what they state to be a fact; so stick a pin there. I know ten other men who worked ten days in company, employed no Indians, and averaged in those ten days 1600 dollars each; so stick another pin there. I know another man, who got out of a basin in a rock, not larger than a washbowl, 24 lb. of gold in 15 minutes; so stick another pin there. Not one of these statements would I believe did I not know the men personally, and know them to be plain matter-of-fact men—men who open a vein of gold just as coolly as you would a potato hill.

Thus far the gold has been obtained in the most primitive manner, by washing the earth in tin pans, wooden bowls, Indian baskets, &c. The average, I am told, has been sixteen dollars per day for each man engaged, and the deeper the soil is dug the richer it becomes. One man obtained over thirty dollars in one washing—any fifteen minutes. I was told by an old miner that not more than one-half of the gold is secured in the present rude, careless way of working. With a proper machine, and the use of quicksilver, double the amount could be taken from the same soil. The largest piece of gold taken by one person is one of 250 dollars. The pieces are of an extraordinary size, the largest weighing half an ounce. The mountains have been explored on every side, and gold found in every creek. It is the opinion of all that 50,000 or 60,000 persons could be profitably employed on the ground now explored. Nor is gold the only mineral discovered here. Platina has been found in one place in some considerable quantity; and very extensive mines of silver only have recently been discovered within five miles of the saw-mill, and are said to be very rich. Iron is also abundant, and will pay about 85 per cent.

The richness of the soil in the immediate neighbourhood of the mines is most astonishing. Farms can be made in every direction that will feed all the miners that can be employed. The climate is found to be very healthy, and free from the chilly winds that hover around the sea-coast. The granite of the mountains is said to be equal to the celebrated Quincy, and a beautiful quarry of marble has been discovered on the Consumny river, specimens of which well, before many years, adorn the fronts of public buildings in your flourishing city.

"The cry is still they come!" While writing this, two men have just arrived from a valley some five or six miles distant, bringing with them 950 dollars' worth of gold, obtained in five days.

I have heard from one of our citizens who has been at the Gold Placers a few weeks, that he had collected 1500 dollars' worth of the "rock of evil," and was still averaging 100 dollars a day. Another gent, wife, and boy, collected 800 dollars' worth in one day. Another, still, who shut up his hotel here some five or six weeks since, has returned with 2500 dollars in pure virgin gold, collected by his own exertions, with no other aid than a spade, pick, and Indian basket.

As near as I can ascertain, there are now about 2000 persons engaged, and the roads leading to the mines are thronged with people and waggons. The implements used are shovels, picks, tin pans, wooden bowls, and Indian baskets. From one to nine ounces of pure virgin gold per day is gathered by every man who performs the requisite labour. The mountains have been explored for about 40 miles, and gold has been found in great abundance in almost every part of them. A gentleman informed me that he had spent some time in exploring the country, and had cut 93 holes with his butcher's knife in different places, and had found gold in every one.

Several extensive silver mines have been discovered, but very little attention is paid to them now. Immense beds of iron ore of superior quality, yielding 85 to 90 per cent, have also been found near the American Fork.

As a necessary consequence of this astounding plentifulness of gold, the price of all commodities in California has risen enormously. Spades and shovels sell for 9 and 10 dols.; blankets and scrappes, which cost 3 and 4 dols., are selling for 45 and 50 dols.; flour, 60 dols. per barrel; sugar, 1 dol. per lb.; and coffee, 2 dols. per lb. Clothing of all kinds is very high. Horses, which formerly sold for 20 or 25 dols., now command from 100 to 200 dols. Labour, of course, shares in the universal rise. When a man can dig gold, and enrich himself for life in a few months, it is not to be expected that he will renounce the temptation, and render himself useful to his fellows by domestic or other service, except at a price measured by the abundance of gold and the scarcity of hands. A negro waiter at the hotel at San Francisco receives a salary of 1700 dollars per annum. Other service is paid in the same proportion; but, generally, service is not to be obtained. All ranks and conditions of men have been equalised. Gold has done what it was supposed death alone could do. It has brought all men to one level. One passion has taken possession of men's minds, and—

All hearts
Are chill'd into a selfish prayer for GOLD.

A letter from New York, dated the 12th of December, states that twenty-four vessels laden with passengers, all bound for the gold country, sailed within three weeks from that port, and that such was the rush of emigrants that the agents of one vessel were obliged to refuse passage to no less than seven hundred applicants. Overland the rushing swarms are equally numerous, and Europe will soon contribute her full share to the swelling tide of the golden emigration.

But this fever will in due time subside. The very superabundance of the gold will remedy the evil. The precious metal will fall in value all over the world. In California itself, the great seat and centre of the golden madness, it has already fallen; for gold is only precious because it is the means of procuring the real wealth of food, shelter, clothing, and the luxuries and comforts of life. The intelligent author of "The Shipwreck of the Juno" relates that he and a score of companions were exposed for many days upon the masts and rigging of a water-logged ship, in the glare of a burning sun, without food, except a very small quantity of bread, and without drink, but such as the chance and scanty rain afforded. The Captain having fallen a victim to his terrible sufferings and privation, his widow came into possession of a large sum in gold, and offered the whole of it for a small crust. The owner of the crust would not be tempted. It was worth to him, in his situation, all the gold of California itself. It was life; and the gold, without it, would have been but a splendid death. Gorgeous, therefore, as are the stories that come to us from California, we must remember that gold is not of itself real wealth under all possible circumstances, and that it is chiefly as the representative of more substantial wealth that it has its value among men. Unless, therefore, more productive work be done, unless more food be grown, more cloth manufactured, more industry employed upon the essential arts of life, the discovery of gold will be but of trifling advantage to the world.

There is scarcely room to doubt, however, that such will be the result. The gold is obtainable in such abundance as to justify the belief that it will have an immense if not immediate effect upon the gold markets of Europe, and that Great Britain, as the chief commercial country of the world, will be the first to feel it. A great impetus to our manufactures cannot fail to be among the first results. A rise in the price of all commodities, and of labour at the same time, will speedily follow. Creditors will suffer; debtors will be enabled to pay their debts in full at half the cost of the present day; annuitants and persons of fixed incomes will be impoverished; but all who depend for their subsistence upon their skill, talent, and industry will be enabled to improve their condition. The public liabilities will be, not theoretically, perhaps, but practically, lightened. The great sum burden of 28 millions annually, which we pay as the interest of our stupendous debt, will press with but half its weight upon the energies of the people, and trade and commerce will take a start unrivalled in the history of the world.

All this is, however, upon the supposition that the accounts from California are not greatly exaggerated. If gold to the value of twenty millions sterling lies on or under the soil of California, it will be a great prize to the finders. It will justify much wonder—perhaps all that has been expressed; but if the supply be not more than four, five, or even twenty-fold as abundant, the consequences upon the trade and social condition of Europe are not likely to be so extensive as those upon which we have speculated in the foregoing sentences. It will doubtless take some time before the real amount of the mineral wealth of California can be correctly estimated. In the meantime, nothing reported of it will cause surprise; and the eager multitude of all nations will rush to share the prize, such as it is, and such as it may be.

THE GOLD DISCOVERIES IN CALIFORNIA.

The following extract from a private letter, dated New York, Dec. 12, 1848, conveys something like a definite idea of those extraordinary discoveries, the accounts respecting which have been so authentically confirmed:—"There is sufficient information in this city to warrant the conjecture that, by the 1st of March, we shall receive three millions, and after that time at least one million a month. You will understand that the surface only of the ground in the valley of Sacramento has been explored; it is possible, therefore, that large mines of mineral wealth may be found in the mountains. This would be to be deplored, as it would turn the whole country of California to the mines, instead of pursuing the peaceful occupation of agriculture and commerce. The effect of all this gold coming into our market will be to turn the exchanges in our favour, and we should keep them so, unless the Americans, not profiting by the experience of '36 and '37, should again import more goods than they can pay for. If this turn out to be the El Dorado, what effect is it going to have on the monetary affairs of England? That is the question which every one now asks his neighbour." The Daily News states that from various facts that have come to their knowledge, the gold-finding mania has extended itself to this side of the Atlantic, and emigrants are eagerly looking towards the land of promise. From one such correspondent they have received the following pithy query:—"Mr. Editor,—Please to give your readers an idea of the cheapest and best way to California.—A CONSTANT READER." In reply to this inquiry the editor of that journal writes:—"We believe we may state that the speediest way of getting to California from this country is by the West India mail steamers, which are in monthly communication with Chagres, on the Isthmus of Darien, thence across to Panama. The United States have established a line of packets between Panama and San Francisco, the first of which is advertised to start from the former place this day (Jan. 1). It is reckoned that this voyage along the Pacific coast of the American will occupy 60 days. From the United States there are four routes:—1st. That from New Orleans to Panama, as above. 2nd. That taken by the emigrant column to Oregon, namely, from St. Louis in Missouri, along the Platte River "bottom," across the south pass of the Rocky Mountains, and over the Salt Plain that lies between the western side of this great range and the Colorado river in California Alta. This journey is undertaken by caravans of forty or fifty waggons, and occupies about four months. 3rd. From Louisiana to Mexico, through Texas; but that road is reckoned very unsafe, as it is used chiefly by horse-coupers—half-breed Mexicans—and slave-dealers. 4th. Along the seaboard of the entire continent of America—north and south, east and west—that is from New York to Cape Horn, and from Cape Horn to the Bay of San Francisco, a voyage of 16,000 miles, and which it would take five months to perform."

At San Francisco, at the end of September, a meeting was held for the purpose of devising means to secure a fixed value to gold dust, and to ensure its adoption, in the present scarcity of coin, as a circulating medium in the ordinary transaction of business, at sixteen dollars an ounce.

The following resolutions were adopted:—

"That unless the citizens of California sustain the price of gold at home, it must depreciate abroad. That they look upon every measure calculated to reduce the price of gold as injurious to the best interests of the country. That the citizens of San Francisco will unite in establishing gold dust as a currency, at 16 dols. per ounce. That the merchant who will receive gold dust at 16 dols. per ounce, in payment of dues, shall be worthy of the patronage of the public."

The following is a letter from San Francisco, dated Oct. 12:—"I have little to add to my last, containing a full note of sales to date. I am selling off slowly the heavy part of my cargo, viz. brown shirting, ticks, kerseys, stripes, ducks, Russia sheeting, hardware, &c. All these articles are wanted. The attention of the whole population is entirely devoted to the gold region. They are going to and fro continually, taking up goods, and bringing down gold dust in payment for their purchases. Much sickness prevails, and many die, as much from want of medical attendance and good nursing as from disease; but the truth is, that they earn nothing for comfort, and submit to every privation. You may believe they are so entirely absorbed by the mania for gold, that the most extravagant reports of the abundance of gold on the Sacramento—it is to be hall for digging. Some dig in the water, others in what are called 'dry diggings'—but all are successful, and value money but little. Packages of goods are exposed for days, for want of room and labourers to store them; but this is attended with not little, if any, risk, owing to the general good-conduct of the people. Since I have been here I have not heard of a single breach of the peace. I hope to close my business in a month, and by that time the rainy season will probably drive sailors down to the port—at present they are not to be had. I do not think much change will take place in prices for articles particularly named, unless the supply should be very heavy. The emigration will be large, and their wants must be supplied. Pork has been sold, to arrive from Columbia River, at sixty dollars per barrel. After I despatch the ship from Valparaiso, I shall return here and establish myself in a general commission business, in connexion with the two young gentlemen."

A correspondent from New York says:—"The number of vessels bound round Cape Horn for San Francisco is increasing, owing, no doubt, to the desire many now have to take that route in preference to the Isthmus. * * * * * The doubt which 'gives us pause' is as to the conveyance across the Isthmus. It is expected, from the statements made at the last meeting of the British West India Steam Navigation Company, that it has laid out a considerable sum of money upon a road in New Granada, and that a large quantity of vehicles were sent recently to try upon it. Here we are told that Chagres is a mere negro village; that a night passed there causes certain death to a white; that the navigation of the river up the Chagres is about 42 miles, to be done by canoes through a stream literally covered with snakes and alligators; that from Cruces to Panama the route is mountainous and full of danger, to be traversed only with mules; and that Panama, though quite a respectable-looking city, is already overstocked by a host of the thousand emigrants, who do not know how they are to get up the coast."

In proof of the statement that the "gold mania" has begun to operate in this country, we may mention that within the last few days a Californian expedition has left Greenock, a number of "navvies" accompanying it, armed with a due supply of spades and smelting-pots.

THEATRICAL PERFORMANCES AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

SHAKSPEARE'S play, "The Merchant of Venice," was performed, by command, in the Castle, on Thursday evening, Dec. 28, 1848. The stage for the performance was erected in the Rubens Room.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Duchess of Kent, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite in waiting, sat on a raised platform in the centre of the apartment. The guests honoured with invitations to the entertainment were seated on either side, on seats of crimson satin, damask, and gold. The following was the programme of the Royal entertainment, which commenced at eight o'clock:—

"Her Majesty's servants will perform at Windsor Castle, on Thursday, Dec. 28, Shakspeare's play of MESSRS. JONES LOYD AND CO., THE BANKERS, have issued, from their place of business at Manchester, a circular, in which they say:—We think it right to inform you that we have ceased to act as bankers at Manchester, from the 25th Dec., on the business hitherto carried on by us will be continued by Edward Loyd, Jun., in conjunction with Mr. William Entwisle, Mr. and Henry Bury, and Mr. Thomas B. Jervis, as our successors, under the new firm of "Loyd, Entwisle, Bury, and Co." We gladly avail ourselves of this opportunity to make our grateful acknowledgments of the uniform kindness and confidence which, through a long period of years, we have experienced from the commercial community in the town and district generally of Manchester and its neighbourhood; and we trust the same kind encouragement will be extended to our successors, in whose progressive prosperity we shall always feel the most lively interest.—We are, your faithful servants, W. JONES LOYD & CO.—King-street, Manchester, Dec. 27, 1848.

DEATH FROM CHLOROFORM.—The Glasgow Herald states that recently a young man named Smith returned from Australia to visit his relations in the neighbourhood of Govan, but before leaving the colony he met with a slight accident in the foot, which being, perhaps, neglected during the passage home, caused the great toe nail to grow into the flesh. To remove the pain and inconvenience, the gentleman resolved to submit to an operation, which a respectable surgeon in Govan was employed to perform on Tuesday last. Preparatory to doing so the surgeon resolved to make use of chloroform; but the patient, after inhaling the gas, almost instantly expired. An investigation of the affair is in progress.

HIGHWAY ROBBERIES AT BIRMINGHAM.—This town and the immediate neighbourhood still continue to be scenes of audacious robberies. On the night of Monday last, about eleven o'clock, a man named Heaton, while passing along the new street, to Faceley-street, was stopped by six men, who threw him down, robbed him of his money, and then so ill-used him, that he remained insensible for nearly two hours. A few days previously, the robbery of a lady was effected in broad daylight, in the fields between Birchfield and Handsworth Old Church. The offender has been apprehended, and committed to take his trial at the ensuing Staffordshire Assizes. A daring robbery was also committed on the high road at Shirley, on the afternoon of Tuesday last. As a dressmaker was taking home a dress, a man suddenly sprung out of the hedge, knocked her down, kicked her severely, and ran away with the parcel.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The existance of a Government which is neither provisional nor revolutionary, but fixed and definite, appears to have created a sense of security in Paris to which its citizens have long been strangers, and from which, therefore, they derive increased satisfaction

On New Year's day, which has always been a day of gladness with the Parisians, the streets of the capital were crowded with joyous groups, whose tranquil cheerfulness contrasted strangely with the agonised violence or of dismay alternately exhibited by the crowds that have hitherto thronged the thoroughfares One incident of rather a stirring nature took place about one o'clock, which passed off with the same quiet that characterised the whole of the day. About 50 or 60 old soldiers of the Imperial army, dressed in the well-known uniform which recals the most glorious deeds of modern French history, marched along the Boulevards, accompanying a gigantic bouquet, which was borne on the shoulders of the most robust and the least stricken in years amongst them. The veteran band comprised the representatives of every arm of the old Imperial army. Amongst these might be distinguished the red uniform of the Lancers of the Imperial Guard; the green of the old Dragons de l'Impératrice; the light blue and white of the cavalry of that country which first gave the lance to the armies of Europe; and the familiar blue with red facings, turned up with white, of the Old Guard. A party of ten or twelve walked in front of the bouquet, another in the rear; and the cordons of the immense box, from which shot up the flowers and shrubs, were held on each side by the oldest of the band. On the sides of the box that contained the offering were traced four or five lines of verse, interwoven in a cipher, and intended to represent the name and rank of the nephew of him whom these veterans had served in other times—the letters were L.N., P.E. The band slowly marched along the Boulevards, and proceeded to the Elysée, the residence of the President of the Republic, for whom the compliment was intended. Large crowds were attracted by the sight, and accompanied the triumphal car Mrs Iadon with flowers to the destination. By the time it reached the Rue Faubourg St. Honoré, the streets in that direction were nearly impassable. Yet, notwithstanding the multitude that formed the cortège, not a cry was heard, and all passed off in the most tranquil manner

The President gave a reception, which is noticed elsewhere.

Throughout the day the shops were thronged with purchasers, thus restoring, in some degree, the old pre-revolutionary appearance of Paris.

Short as is the time since the new Cabinet has entered office, it has sufficed to produce some Ministerial changes of consequence, which have been caused by the respective rights and duties of the President of the Republic, and his Ministry not being so clearly defined and comprehended by both parties as to prevent misunderstanding. The resignations and appointments are—1st, M. Léon Faucher, Minister of the Interior, in the place of M. Léon de Malleville. 2nd. M. Lacrosse, Vice-President of the National Assembly, Minister of Public Works, in the place of M. Léon Faucher. And, 3rd, M. Rouher, Minister of Justice of the people, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, in the place of M. Bixio

The cause of the resignation of M. Léon de Malleville, Minister of the Interior, was understood to be that the President made an attempt to withdraw from the purely belonged to that department; and M de Malleville having refused to countersign it, Prince Louis Napoleon rated him for the act in a letter couched in despotic language à la Bonaparte. The appointment proposed by the President, and rejected by M. de Malleville, was that of Count Nieuwerkerke, a distinguished sculptor, to the post of Director of Fine Arts. This appointment was understood to have been proposed at the urgent request of the Princess Demidoff, the President's cousin. It is further stated that the President demanded from M. de Malleville three letters which he had addressed to Louis Philippe after the affair of Strasbourg, and which remain deposited in the archives of the Ministry of the Interior. These letters M. de Malleville refused to give up. It is stated, also, that the President required to have the telegraphic despatches communicated to him, as well as other details of the administration, which M. de Malleville thought it his duty to withhold.

The Reforme contains the following version of the cause of the resignation of M. Léon de Malleville:—" According to certain reports, the Minister of the Interior finally refused to deliver up to the President of the Republic the evidence collected relative to the affairs of Strasbourg and Boulogne, because that evidence was collected by a certain Minister of the Republic himself when he was Under-Secretary of State and Director-General of the Police of the Kingdom under Louis-Philippe. Amongst other documents, it is said, were several autograph letters written by police agents against the present President of the Republic. The scruples of the Minister may well be imagined, and that consequently he would rather resign than deliver up his own work

The resignation of M. Bixio arose from his being the only one of the Ministry who approved of the course taken by M. de Malleville.

M. Lacrosse, who has been nominated to the Ministry of Public Works, vacated by M. Léon Faucher, was a strong supporter of General Cavaignac, but nevertheless headed to the moderate party.

The demand for the dissolution of the National Assembly is becoming more clamourous every day, and on Saturday last a proposition on the subject was formally brought forward. It is to the effect that the election of the Legislative Assembly shall take place on March 4th; that that Assembly shall be convoked for the 10th, on which day the functions of the present Assembly shall terminate; and that, in the event of the election not being completed by that day, the functions of the electoral law and the law relative to the Council of State. This proposition has been declared "urgent," has been referred to the Committee of Justice and Legislation.

The great distress which exists amongst the poorer classes at present in Paris, and the non-fulfilment—by any immediate results—of the extravagant expectations which the more humble and numerous classes of his supporters at the late election seem to have formed to themselves of the benefits to be derived from the part of the Prince-President rounded by the Ministers and Marshals of France, and attended by General Changarnier and a numerous and brilliant staff. He wore the uniform of General of the National Guard, with the Grand Cordon and Star of the Legion of Honour, and stood in the centre of the magnificent saloon on the ground-floor, in front of the Marshals, and uncovered. The company passed him, moving from the left to the right. All the members of the diplomatic corps were in full dress of ceremony. The Pope's Nuncio was the first, the British Ambassador the second; followed, in succession, by the Spanish and Belgian Ambassadors, the Dutch and Swedish Ministers, and the Chargés d'Affaires of the other powers. The President advanced towards the Apostolic Nuncio, and expressed his hope of soon seeing his Holiness re-established in his States. This marked reception seemed to have a lively effect on the representative of the Court of Rome. The President gave all the other Ambassadors assurances of his sincere desire for peace and union.

The other constituted bodies passed the President in the following order:—The old officers of the Empire; the superior officers in non-activity; the Courts of Cassation and Accounts; the superior Council of the University; the Court of Appeal, in their robes, with their first Presidents and Procureurs-Général at their head. The President addressed the first President, M. Portalis, and spoke of the illustrious reputation of his father, and the high esteem in which he was held by the Emperor. On receiving M. Troplong, recently made first President of the Court of Appeal, the President of the Republic expressed his satisfaction at having had to place one of his first signatures to the nomination of so eminent a lawyer, called to that post by public opinion. When the Board of Admiralty came forward, the President addressed Admiral Hugon, and expressed his admiration of his conduct at the Battle of Navarino, the siege of Algiers in 1830, and in 1841, when he commanded the fleet in the East.

ANCIENT AND MODERN ROME.

Rome Imperial! Rome majestic!
Shade of greatness vanish'd all—
Looking down th' abyss of ages
To behold thy rise and fall,
We can trace upon thy forehead,
Queen and order of thy day,
Broadly marked the awful sentence,
"Pass away!"

Great but wicked, fair but cruel,
Sceptre'd mischief, worshipp'd long,
Never yet did men or nations
Prosper finally in wrong.
Justice did her work upon thee,
Mightier than thine own her sway,
'Twas her voice pronounced thy judgment—
"Pass away!'

Modern Rome! thou mitred phœnix!
Risen from those embers cold,
Looking dimly through the future,
The same shadow we behold—
Shadow of a power departing,
Spectre of a great decay,
Bearing on its front the motto,
"Pass away!"

Whither went the ancient Cæsars
With the pomp of peace or war,
Thither go the modern Pontiffs
With dominion grander far.
Papal stole and regal purple
Fall in ripeness of the day,
Cæsar's crown and Pope's tiara
"Pass away!"

Priestly Rome! thy cup is filling:
In our era dauntless Truth,
Feels her life and struggles upwards
With the energy of youth.
Thou shalt bind her wings no longer,
Never more her progress stay;
Thou hast lived thy generation—
"Pass away!"

If hereafter from thy ashes
A new phœnix shall ascend,
May she learn to dwell with Virtue
And take Freedom for her friend
If as thou she clogs the spirit,
And denies the truth of day,
On her head thy doom be spoken—
"Pass away!"

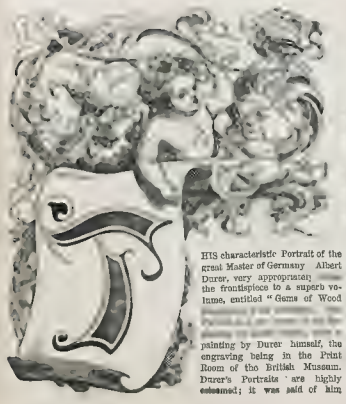
ALBERT DURER.—FROM A PICTURE BY HIMSELF.



HIS characteristic Portrait of the great Master of Germany Albert Durer, very appropriately forms the frontispiece to a superb volume, entitled "Gems of Wood painting by Durer himself, the engraving being in the Print Room of the British Museum. Durer's Portraits are highly esteemed; it was said of him that he not only possessed the talent of catching the exact expression of the features, but also of delineating the different characters and passions. Hence, it is reasonable to infer the Portrait before us to be an accurate

The fitness of this Illustration for a volume of masterpieces of Wood graving, will be acknowledged when the high fame of Albert Durer as an engraver on wood is recollected: his wood-cuts are triumphs of the art, and fered equal to those of Hugh de art of what is technically termed "bringing up," in heightening the fine effects of light and shade, the work is an unsurpassed specimen of the printer's art; the breadth and delicacy, in some instances, is truly surprising. The works of the old masters have furnished many subjects, sacred and secular; and the painters of our own time, even to the exh bitions of the last Lond n season, have contributed several charming scenes: in the school of English landscape, as well as of the Marine class, there are some exquisite productions.

Prefixed is a kind of catalogue raisonnée of the illustrations, with a few lines descriptive of each subject, its artist, and the manner of engraving of which it is a specimen. Appended is the "History of the Origin and Progress of Wood-Engraving," which originally appeared in this Journal in 1844; to which several additions have been made. We should not omit to mention the illustrative head and tail-pieces, initial letters, &c., as accessories of this beautiful record of art.

As a gift-book for the season, but still possessing more permanent attractions for all who cherish a love of the fine arts productions of the pencil and the graver, the present volume is entitled to foremost rank. Twenty years ago, such a work as the present could not possibly have been produced; and, hence will, doubtless, be awarded to it a high position in the memorials of the art of our time.

KENTISH TOWN NATIONAL, INFANT, AND SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

These Schools, which have just been erected in the district of Kentish Town, in the northern part of the parish of St. Pancras, comprise three school-rooms, affording accommodation for 150 boys, 150 girls, and 130 infants, with a suitable class-room attached to each. Every arrangement requisite for cleanliness, ventilation, &c., has been carefully attended to, and spacious play-grounds in the rear of the buildings will enable the children to take recreation without leaving the premises. Three teachers' residences, consisting each of four rooms, form the eastern wing of the building, which is arranged as a quadrangle, the fourth side being open, and facing towards the south. The turret acts as a ventilator to the National Schools. The site, consisting of one acre, has been conveyed, by the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church, Oxford, under the sanction of an act of Parliament, and forms part of a small estate, bequeathed, upwards of a century and a half ago, by the celebrated preacher, Dr. South, to Christ Church, as a foundation for studentships; and, from the conditions of the transfer, this estate will be much enhanced in annual value when laid out as building ground.

The architect is Mr John H. Hakewill, the builders Messrs. J'Anson. The total cost—about £3000—is defrayed partly by grants from the National Society and the Committee of Privy Council on Education, the new regulations of the latter having been scrupulously attended to throughout, so that these Schools form a fair model of what is required and recommended by the Privy Council, and partly by liberal private subscriptions, &c., which still require some additions.

On the 21st ult., the day previous to the opening, the Bishop of London preached in behalf of the building fund, at Kentish Town Chapel, and the collections after his Lordship's and two other sermons amounted to £107. On New Year's Day, after attending service at the chapel, the school children, with the clergy in their robes, the subscribers and visitors, repaired to the new buildings. An appropriate prayer was delivered by the Rev. W. Milner, Minister of Kentish Town, and a hymn was sung by the children. A meeting of the subscribers and visitors was then held, the Rev. W. Milner in the chair; and a report from the Sub-Committee, detailing the present state of the funds, &c., having been read, the meeting was addressed by the Rev. D. Laing, C. Phillips, T. Allinger, E. Lawrence, Esq., James Beaumont, Esq., Harry Chester, Esq., George Hodgkinson, Esq., &c., who strongly urged the support of the Schools by increased annual subscriptions. At the conclusion, the school-children were regaled with a plentiful and substantial dinner of roast beef and plum-pudding, laid out in the National School-rooms, which had been tastefully adorned with evergreens for the occasion. During the whole of the morning and afternoon the rooms were crowded with visitors; and upwards of £200, including the collections at the sermons, have been received towards making up the deficiency.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

M'Kane v. Lord Harley. Privileges of a Peer.—On Saturday, an application was made to Mr. Baron Platt for Mr. Cornford, solicitor to the present Earl of Oxford, who was detained in the Queen's Prison as the Hon A. Fred Harley, commonly called Lord Harley, for his discharge, as having succeeded, by the death of his father, to the title of the Earl of Oxford. The necessary documents were produced, and his Lordship, after considering the matter, directed the attorneys of the several detaining creditors to show cause why the Earl of Oxford should not be discharged from custody, he being a Peer of the realm. The summonses were made returnable on Monday, on which day several attorneys attended on the part of the creditors. In some cases the parties appeared, and orders were made for the discharge of the noble defendant; but in the above-named cause the application was resisted by the detaining creditor's attorney. It was submitted that a Peer was not entitled to his privilege of Peerage until he had taken the oaths prescribed.—Mr. Baron Platt said he had no doubt that a Peer was privileged before he had taken the oaths, and requested to be furnished with cases which would show the contrary. After some discussion, His Lordship adjourned the summons for an hour, in order that counsel might appear for the creditor.—At a subsequent period of the day the matter was resumed. A barrister attended, and stated that he had been engaged to state this effect that a Peer was not privileged until he had taken his seat.—His Lordship made the order in this as well as in the several other cases for the discharge of the Earl of Oxford from the Queen's Prison, in this case a point was incidentally mentioned of a moral and important character, namely, whether the discharge would extinguish the several debts of the detaining creditors, or whether the judgments would survive the discharge of the Lordship. It seems that there is no case on the subject, and the question will decide whether an execution by operation of law will extinguish a debt in the same manner as a discharge by the act of a creditor. Orders in the several cases were drawn up, and the Earl of Oxford was discharged from the Queen's Prison.

POLICE.

HAMMERSMITH.

Extensive Robbery of Jewellery.—On Saturday last, T. Chatsell, a boy, living at 25, High-row, Knightsbridge, was charged on suspicion of having been concerned, with other persons not in custody, in breaking into the residence of Count Carlo Pepelio, No. 11, St. George's-terrace, Gloucester-road, Kensington, on the preceding Monday evening, and stealing therefrom a large gold colina, and jewellery, &c., to the value of upwards of £200.—Count Pepelio deposed that on the evening mentioned, about half-past eight o'clock, in consequence of an alarm given by one of his servants, he went up to one of the attics, the door of which he found locked on the inside. An entrance was immediately effected, and on going in he found inside two dressing-cases, which had been taken from his and his Consuls' dressing-rooms, where they were also kept. On examining them, he found they had been opened by false keys, and their contents, which consisted of diamond ear-rings, brooches, rings, several gold bracelets studded with precious stones, two rich sparkling portraits of members of the Bonaparte family, several massive and heavy gold chains, numerous other rings and other jewellery, three gold watches, one having on the back a miniature of the Holy Virgin and Child, had all been taken away. Witness also found in the attic a desk belonging to himself, which had been broken open, and about £180 in Bank of England notes, tied together with a number of gold and silver medals, and French and Italian coin, a silver cross of Napoleon, Charles X., Louis XVI., Gregory XVI., Pius IX. &c., stolen therefrom. Among the notes were two for £10 each, and one for £5, numbered 50,117 to 50,134, and dated the 2nd of October, 1848. He likewise saw muddy and sooty foot-marks, which extended from the attic he had spoken of to the bedroom and dressing-room, and back again. On inspecting the premises, and found that there was an empty house in the same terrace, No. 19, which he had also examined, and found certain similar footmarks to those the Count had described in his evidence, which also extended over the leads of the eight intervening houses between the empty house and the Count's residence. He had also ascertained that the ladder had been employed at the empty house on the day of the robbery, to remove some coals, and that the possession of the key for that purpose. He was also seen in the neighbourhood of the Count's house from time to time previous to the robbery, and on the morning after the robbery, and on going in he found inside two dressing-cases, which had been broken open and about eight o'clock in the evening, the robbery being presumed to have been committed between seven and eight o'clock. He had, however, no doubt, from the information he had received, that if the prisoner was remanded for a few days, he should, at the next examination, be able to produce other and important evidence against him. The prisoner said he was quite innocent of the robbery. He could prove that he gave up the key of the empty house when he had removed the coals, and he could also prove that he was at a relative's at Knightsbridge at the evening.—The prisoner was remanded for a week.

Narrow Escape of Charles Cowan, Esq., M.P.—On Thursday afternoon (last week), about four o'clock, while Mr Cowan was driving along in a gig, in the direction of Clerk-street, Edinburgh, in the neighbourhood of the city, the horse stumbled, and becoming frightened, set off at full gallop till it reached Montagne-street, down which it turned. When about twelve or fifteen yards from the bottom of the street, which is closed up by a dead wall, the driver threw himself from the gig, and from the velocity at which the animal was proceeding, fell with some force on the ground, grazing his cheek, and slightly injuring his leg. Mr. Cowan kept his seat; and the animal's course having been stopped by the wall, against which it came with some force, shattering the shafts of the vehicle, he fortunately contrived to get out without injury. He had no sooner accomplished this than the horse again set off up the street in the opposite direction, but, on reaching the top of it, its course was stopped by a fall, when it was secured and taken to Mr. Dick's, veterinary surgeon, Clyde-street. We are happy to state that Mr. Cowan sustained no injury, and that the driver's bruises are slight. The horse, which was a valuable animal, also escaped with all other information, of Lee Secretary.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1849.

Mr. Cobden's letter to the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, and Mr. Macgregor's address to his constituents at Glasgow, have brought the subject of the National Expenditure somewhat prominently before the public. The question of Taxation and Expenditure is urgent, and had already taken a firm hold of the opinion of the country. No man in the position of either of these gentlemen could fail to attract attention when speaking or writing on such a subject. Mr. Cobden's letter unfolds a bold and striking project. Whether it will be effective, is another question. He finds that the expenditure of 1835 was eleven millions less than that of 1848; and he simply proposes to go back to the estimates of the former period. He asserts that if the smaller sum only be voted by Parliament, Ministers will find no difficulty in raising as well in 1849 as it did in 1835, and supports this view of the case by the high financial authority of the late Sir Henry Parnell. With an expenditure less by eleven millions than it is at present, he would repeal the Assessed Taxes, the Malt Duty, the Duty on Hops, the Excise Duty on Soap and on Paper, and the Advertisement Duty, and would also reduce the Tea Duty to one shilling per pound, besides affording some relief to the great bulk of the consuming and producing community.

The statement is skilfully (the political opponents of the honourable gentleman say, cunningly) contrived, to unite in its support the bulk of the people. The repeal of the Assessed Taxes would be a great boon to all the dwellers in towns; the repeal of the Malt Tax would be considered a boon equally splendid by the agricultural interest; and with these two classes united strongly in support of the scheme, it would be no easy matter for any Ministry to resist its application, daring as the project may at present appear. Mr. Macgregor's exposition is not a new one. It is reproduced mainly from one of the bulky statistical volumes of the honourable gentleman; but it is none the worse for having been previously given to the public. Mr. Macgregor would abolish all the Customs Duties, except on eight articles: but as these are the most productive, the Revenue would lose but little by the alteration. He would reduce our naval, military, and general expenditure by about six millions only, and would grant relief from taxation oppressive to the poorer classes by increasing the Property Tax to five per cent.

It will be seen that Mr. Cobden's plan is the bolder and abler of the two; but Mr. Macgregor's exposition—after due allowance for its prolixity and bad grammar—will possibly be considered by many as the safer guide. Both of them will be of service to the cause of good government. They will create discussion; and it is high time that the energies of our leading statesmen should be concentrated upon the great task before them. The equalization of income and expenditure must be accomplished; and there must, at the same time, be a remission of taxes that press unfairly and prejudicially upon the industry or health of the people.

It is disgraceful to the civilization of Europe that all its chief States should have acted, and should continue to act, upon principles of financial extravagance, which would entail shame and ruin on private individuals. Great Britain has long been an offender, we will not say against common honesty, but certainly against ordinary prudence; and the adjustment long postponed must come sooner or later. States, like individuals, must set their houses in order, or pay the penalty; for financial difficulties are of a kind that will not be trifled with for ever. The day of reckoning may be procrastinated and reprocrastinated, but it will come at last—all the more gloomily and heavily from the delay. In a time of war, it was impossible to meet our difficulties without contracting debts; but in a time of peace, it is not creditable to our national character that we should have added to our liabilities, and have gone on from year to year increasing expenditure, when we ought to have diminished it; shutting our eyes against unpleasant realities, and trusting to the chapter of accidents to "make both ends meet." There is, however, a fair prospect that the matter will be taken in hand seriously as soon as Parliament shall re-assemble.

THE affairs of the Papal States make little progress towards a satisfactory solution. The Pope remains at Gaëta, surrounded by his Cardinals, and almost daily visited by the King and the nobilities of Naples. Tranquillity prevails in Rome, and a Supreme Junta has entered upon the exercise of authority. The convocation of a Constituent Assembly, to determine the ultimate destination and form of Government of the country, is under consideration; but neither the Pope nor the Junta seems anxious to precipitate matters in the meantime. The spiritual authority of the Pope does not appear to have ceased at Rome, however much his temporal authority may have been denied and resisted. The Christmas mass, which was usually performed at midnight, in St. Peter's, was ordered by the Pope to be performed at daybreak, and it was so performed accordingly, in the presence of a large concourse of the Romans. In anticipation of hostilities with Austria, the Junta is busily engaged in organising an efficient force, and volunteers continue to pour in from all parts of the States. Prince Barberini has left Rome for Gaëta, to attempt a conciliation between the Pope and his people.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert inspected a finished etching by Samuel Cousins, A.R.A., of the forthcoming engraving from Winterhalter's picture of the Royal Family, which was submitted to them at Windsor.

On Sunday the Queen and his Royal Highness and the younger members of the Royal Family took an early walk in the Home-park. Her Majesty, the Prince, and ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household attended divine service in the Private Chapel. The service was performed and the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. C. L. Cresswell.

On Monday his Royal Highness, attended by Lord Byron, Sir Frederick Stovin, the Hon. Col. Phipps, and the Hon. Captain Gordon shot in Windsor Forest.

On Wednesday, Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke of Newcastle and Duc d'Aumale, attended by Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps and Captain [illegible]

LORD JOHN RUSSELL returned to his residence in Richmond Park on Saturday from Windsor Castle.

THE QUEEN'S NEW YEAR'S GIFTS AT WINDSOR.—The distribution of her Majesty's New Year's gifts to 500 poor families of Windsor and Eton took place on Monday morning in the presence of the Queen, Prince Albert, the juvenile branches of the Royal Family, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household. At the more gifts from several of the Home counties and others, which are annually distributed, at the discretion of the Queen, to such persons in the neighbourhood of the Castle as are upon which were placed the various gifts to be presented to the poor of Windsor and Eton. These consisted of 500 4lb. loaves, and 750 lb. of plum-pudding, supplied by Messrs. Tull and Pitt; 1300 lb. of beef, supplied by Messrs Hughes and Adams; 650 blankets and three scarlet cloaks, supplied by Mr. Gayley; and 1222 yards of calico and 628 yards of flannel, supplied by Messrs. Bird and Allen. Her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, Prince Alfred, and Princess Alice, and Helena, all attended by a numerous suite, left the Castle at the York and Lancaster gateway, walking across the Home Park to the Riding School, and during the distribution stationed themselves in the Queen's closet, which commanded an unobstructed view of the gratifying scene below. Among those who were invited to witness the interesting ceremony were —the Hon. and Rev. Dean of Windsor, Lady Charlotte Neville Grenville and the Misses Neville, the Rev Isaac Gosset, the Rev. Stephen Hawtrey, the Rev. A. J. Gould, the Hon. and Rev C. L. Courtenay, the Mayor of Windsor, and the magistrates of the borough, and the clerical members of the Royal family. The recipients of the Royal bounty were stationed at the western end of the Riding School, where they awaited the arrival of the Court. The distribution occupied upwards of an hour; at the conclusion the Royal party returned across the Home Park to the Castle. Her Majesty looked remarkably well, and in excellent health

SERENADE TO HER MAJESTY ON NEW YEAR'S MORNING.—At the early hour of half-past 6, the band of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards assembled in the Home Park, and stationed themselves beneath the bed-room window of her Majesty in the Augusta Tower, surrounding the Queen and her Royal Consort with the following music:—Reveille, by Walch; Quick Step, by Kunner; and the National Anthem. Mr. Weiland, the leader, and the whole of the band, afterwards partook of breakfast in the Castle.

FIRES IN LONDON DURING 1848.—On Monday Mr. Braidwood, the superintendent of the London fire-engine establishment, made his annual return of the fires which had occurred during the past year in the metropolitan district. The return includes every disaster that had taken place by fire up to twelve o'clock on Sunday night, from which it appears that the premises partly destroyed and considerably damaged were 296. The number of buildings slightly damaged by fire, water, &c., were 309, making a total number of fires of 605. The false alarms to which the engines and firemen had been called were 129. There had been 86 chimneys on fire to which the firemen had given their assistance. The total number of calls for assistance was 1011. There had been 10 fatal fires, and the number of lives lost were 2 firemen and 12 private individuals. The most disastrous fires were those at New-cross, Shadwell, the Surrey and Hatcock, two of the brigade from the Waterloo-square station, were crushed to death by the falling of the floors of a steam corn-mill, owing to the great weight of the machinery in the upper floors; that which recently occurred in Gray's Inn-lane, where a husband and wife perished; the one in the chapel-road, where two persons were burned to death; and the extensive mill in Mary-street, Whitechapel, where a man was killed [illegible] upon him. These [illegible] especially alluded to in the return, the different buildings damaged on that occasion being upwards of 100. The yearly average of fires in the metropolis for the last fifteen years is thus given, which shows a large increase in their number. Premises totally destroyed and considerably damaged, 216. Slightly damaged, 428. The total was, therefore, 644 fires; 75 false alarms, 35 chimneys; and 1.0 total of calls for fires and false alarms 814, showing an increase of 197 this year over the average of former years. During the same period seven firemen had lost their lives in the execution of their duty, and 2.89 private individuals had been burned to death. This return does not include the number of children who annually perish through their clothes taking fire, but merely those who have been known to be burned in the fires attended by the brigade.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE EARLY CLOSING MOVEMENT.—Pursuant to directions issued by the Bishop of London, the metropolitan clergy are actively engaged within their respective districts, forming, for the instruction of young men released from business by the progress of the early closing movement evening classes in Greek, Hebrew, Latin, Mechanics, Philosophy, Drawing, &c.; the instructors, chiefly clergymen, will give their services gratuitously. Rewards for proficiency, and honorary certificates for attendance, are to be granted to the young men. Seventeen of these classes have already been established in the metropolis.

OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA AT AN INFANT ORPHAN ASYLUM.—During Tuesday and Wednesday, the members of the boards of guardians of the various metropolitan parishes and unions who farm out their pauper children at Mr. Dronet's Infant Poor Establishment at Tooting, were considerably alarmed on the receipt of information that cholera of a most fatal character had broken out amongst the children. Mr. Dronet has under his care from 1400 to 1500 children of both sexes farmed out to him, under the sanction of the Poor-Law Commissioners, from various metropolitan parishes and unions, for whom each parish pays 3s. 6d. per head per week. The children exhibited their usual healthy appearance up to Friday (last week), when, in some of the wards, several children were attacked with severe diarrhœa, and in two or three instances the cases assumed the form of Asiatic cholera, and were treated accordingly; but, in some few of the cases death ensued in the short space of three hours. Every hour brought new patients, and undoubted evidence manifesting itself that the epidemic was extending its baneful influence to others. Dr. Addison, of Guy's Hospital, was sent for, to consult with the resident medical officers. Up to that time fifty-seven cases and twelve deaths had occurred. Officers from the various parishes were summoned to Tooting, and the establishment was examined, when it was found that the drains of the buildings emptied themselves into an extensive ditch abutting on the ground, and which it was believed might have a prejudicial effect. The united opinion of all the medical gentlemen assembled concurred in stating the disease to have arisen from atmospheric poison, and not from the food the patients had taken. Communication of the occurrence has been forwarded to the Poor-law Board, Somerset-house, as also to Mr. Carter, the Coroner for Surrey, but it is not known whether any official inquiry will be instituted.

MOUNT ST. BERNARD HOSPICE ASYLUM.—The half-yearly report of this institution, which is in connexion with the Roman Catholic Soup Kitchen, states that, from the 16th of July to 30th December last, 80,98[illegible] rations of soup and bread have been distributed to indigent persons. Under the classes to which these wretched recipients belong are some curious entries. There are, of dissenting ministers, 2; surgeons, 2; one chemist; one retired officer; [illegible] weyers, 2; law-stationers, 2; one law-writer; clerks, 36; schoolmasters, 3; one governess; artists, 4; actors, 3; shopkeepers, 9; shop assistants, 10[illegible]; artisans of various trades, 3397 males, 610 females; butlers, 3; and other domestic servants, 121 males, 319 females; gentlewomen, 473; navvy labourers, 59; field labourers, 287; ten dent destitute poor, 7500 males, 14,074 females; wandering destitute poor, 293 males, 509 females; wives [illegible] of artisans, 1990; sailors, 29; firemen, 17 males, 1 female; and [illegible] children of both sexes. In addition to the vast amount of relief afforded to the poor, forty-eight "street orderlies" belonging to the National Philanthropic Association have been provided for during the past year. Not a few of these men have been taken from the workhouses in the metropolis, and the remainder destitute and forlorn wanderers have been furnished with work. In the Refuge belonging to these establishments, since its opening on the 20th of March to the 30th December, 1848, a clean bed by night, with a good supper and breakfast, has been afforded to 4540 men, 1603 women, and 417 children; in all, 6578 persons. Thirty-nine destitute young females, having good references to character, and having been for some time watched over by the matron, have been by her recommended to situations; and no less than 116 other female servants sheltered in this hospice, and evidently rescued from destitution and crime, have by their own exertions obtained situations, and, subsequently visiting the matron, have returned thanks for the kindness afforded them. It is also gratifying to state that 244 artisans of various callings, who have been inmates of this asylum, have since they obtained employment, called to return thanks for the relief they received whilst destitute.

A GOLD WASHING.

GOLD WASHING.

THE recent discovery of vast deposits of gold in Upper California, with the latest intelligence received by Wednesday's mail from the United States, will be found elsewhere in our present Number. Our object, in this place, is to furnish the reader with correct information as to the mode adopted in washing for gold in other countries—in Brazil, for example; and this we find very minutely described in Mr. Mawe's valuable "Travels in the Interior of Brazil, particularly in the Gold and Diamond Districts of that Country." Mr. Mawe travelled by authority of the Prince Regent of Portugal, and thus enjoyed great facilities for his researches, notwithstanding he, in some instances, endured great hardships. His extensive acquaintance with mineralogy, and his practical knowledge of the science, upon which he has written and published some truly valuable works, fitted our traveller especially for these investigations: and the integrity of his narrative of adventures has been invariably accredited. The first Illustration we have selected is a View of a Gold Washing at Jaraguá, near Saint Paul's, in the Gold District. These mines of Jaraguá were the first discovered in the country; and they were famed for the immense treasures they produced nearly two centuries since, when, at the ports of Santos and St. Vincent, whence the gold was shipped for Europe, this district was regarded as the Peru of Brazil. Mr. Mawe thus describes the modes of Washing:—

"The face of the country is uneven and rather mountainous. The rock, where it is exposed, appears to be primitive granite, inclining to gneiss, with a portion of hornblende, and frequently mica. The soil is red, and remarkably ferruginous, in many places apparently of great depth. The gold lies, for the most part, in a stratum of rounded pebbles and gravel, called cascalhao, immediately incumbent on the solid rock. In the valleys, where there is water, occur frequent excavations made by the gold-washers, to a considerable extent, some of them fifty or a hundred feet wide, and eighteen or twenty feet deep. On many of the hills, where water can be collected for washing, particles of gold are found in the soil little deeper than the roots of the grass.

"The mode of working these mines, more fully to be denominated washings, is simple, and may be easily explained.

"Suppose a loose, gravel like stratum of rounded quartzose pebbles and adventitious matter incumbent on granite, and covered by earthy matter of variable thickness. Where water of sufficiently high level can be commanded, the ground is cut in steps, each twenty or thirty feet wide, two or three broad, and about one deep. Near the bottom a trench is cut to the depth of two or three feet. On each step stand six or eight negroes, who, as the water flows gently from above, keep the earth continually in motion with shovels, until the whole is reduced to liquid mud, and washed below. The particles of gold contained in this earth descend to the trench, where, by reason of their specific gravity, they quickly precipitate. Workmen are continually employed at the trench to remove the stones, and clear away the surface, which operation is much assisted by the current of water which falls into it.

FOLIATED GOLD WITH QUARTZ.

"After five days' waiting, the precipitation in the trench is carried to some convenient stream, to undergo a second clearance. For this purpose, wooden bowls are provided, of a funnel shape, about two feet wide at the mouth, and five or six inches deep, called gamellas. Each workman, standing in the stream, takes into his bowl five or six pounds weight of the sediment, which generally consists of heavy matter, such as oxide of iron, pyrites, ferruginous quartz, &c., of a dark carbonaceous hue. They admit certain quantities of water into the bowls, which they move about so dexterously, that the precious metal, separating from the inferior and lighter substances, settles to the bottom and sides of the vessel. They then rinse their bowls in a larger vessel of clean water, leaving the gold in it, and begin again.

"The washing of each bowl-full occupies from five to eight or nine minutes. The gold produced is extremely variable in quantity and the size of its particles—some of which are so minute, that they float, while others are found as large as peas, and not unfrequently much larger. This operation is superintended by overseers, as the result is of considerable importance.

"When the whole is finished, the gold is borne home to be dried, and at a convenient time is taken to the permutation office, where it is weighed, and a fifth is reserved for the Prince. The remainder is smelted by fusion with muriate of mercury, cast into ingots, assayed, and stamped according to its intrinsic value—a certificate of which is given with it; after a copy of that instrument has been duly entered at the Mint Office, the ingots circulate as specie."

The second Illustration shows more distinctly this mode of washing with the bowls, or gamellas; while the first scene is that of the "Washing," as the locality is technically termed.

SPECIMENS OF GOLD.

We are indebted for the accompanying Illustrations of the conditions in which gold is found to Mr. Tennant, Professor of Mineralogy in King's College, London, who has obligingly placed at the service of our Artist the series of specimens whence these Engravings have been carefully copied.

CRYSTALS OF GOLD.

Rounded waterworn pebble of gold with quartz, weighing 9 oz. 14 dwts; it contains upwards of six ounces of gold. Brazils. (Stowe collection, No. 2734).

Foliated gold with quartz, from Mexico. (Stowe collection, No. 2727).

Flat grains and particles of gold, separated from the alluvial soil by washing commonly termed "gold dust," from the west coast of South America.

Crystals of gold, brought by the late Mr. Mawe from Brazil.

Detached octahedron (2720 of Stowe collection), from Transylvania.

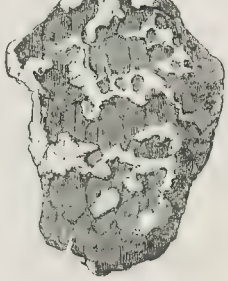
Three of these specimens were in the Mineralogical Collection at Stowe, where they were purchased by Mr. Tennant. Some of the crystals were brought by Mr. Mawe from Villo do Principe. he says, "At a washing about six leagues distant, a lump of gold was found of several pounds weight." From the same place Mr. Mawe procured some above two ounces, and obtained the large crystals, one of which is considered unique.

CHARACTERS OF GOLD.

Mr. Tennant has also favoured us with the following notes on substances resembling gold in appearance; viz. iron and copper pyrites, and mica. Gold differs from them in the following particulars:

In specific gravity: that of gold being seventeen times greater than water, that of iron pyrites 7·5 (or 7½), of copper pyrites 4·3, and of mica 3.

Gold may be cut with a knife like lead, may be bent and beat out into very thin leaves, but iron pyrites cannot be cut or even scratched with a knife; copper pyrites is brittle; mica is foliated and very elastic.



ROUNDED WATER-WORN PEBBLE OF GOLD WITH QUARTZ.

3. Under the action of the blowpipe gold retains its colour, but copper pyrites and iron pyrites instantly lose it; the latter, also, becomes magnetic.

4. Gold is also not acted upon by nitric, muriatic, or sulphuric acid singly; but when the two former are combined it is then soluble. If any of the other three minerals be reduced to powder, either of these acids will readily act upon them.

Next week, we shall resume our Illustration with Views in Upper California where the gold deposits have just been discovered.

THE MAIL COACHES.

O LUXURY of travel! joy refined!
To fly, steam-harness'd, on the ponderous train,
And feel the victory of mighty mind
Over space and time, for uses not in vain!
Yet ever in this world must loss and gain
Balance each other. Is it speed we prize?
'Tis edged with danger, equipoised by pain
And aids our business but to cheat our eyes.
Th' unsocial Rail affords no varied pleasure
Like yours, ye coaches of a former day:
Apt for our haste, delightful for our leisure,
We miss the cantering team, the winding way,
The road-side halt, the post-horn's well-known air,
The inns, the gaping towns, and all the landscape fair.

THE ARRIVING TRAIN.

Behold it comes, loud panting, from afar,
As if it lived, and of its own fierce will
Ran [illegible] with wild winds blowing shrill!
[illegible] m-rubb'd, of giant le[illegible]h,
Snake-like it comes exulting in its strength,

NEW STYLE—THE MAIL TRAIN

COUNTRY NEWS.

ROBBERY OF THE MAILS ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

A series of robberies of the most extraordinary and extensive character were perpetrated on the up and down mails traversing the Great Western Railway during the night of Monday last.

The mail leaving Plymouth at 8 p.m., and Exeter at 9 p.m., on Monday arrived at Bristol after its usual hour—half-past ten o'clock—without any suspicion having been entertained that the mail-bags had been tampered with, or that any of the letters were missing. Indeed, it had been the practice during the night of the mail-coaches accompanying the mail, and subsequently with the post-office authorities at Bristol, to open the mail-bags for the purpose of taking out the letters addressed to that city.

The discovery, of course, occasioned extreme consternation among the officials. The guard was quite positive the bags were safe when the train left Bridgewater, and as no stoppage had taken place between that town and the city of Bristol, it was self-evident that the robberies must have been effected by some parties travelling by the train, and while it was in motion. After a few moments' consultation, it was resolved to send the mail-guard on bags on to London in the state in which the guard had discovered them; and accordingly the train left Bristol on its upward journey after a very short delay.

On reaching town at an early hour on Tuesday morning the guard proceeded to the Post-office, in Martin-le-Grand, and made a report of the circumstances above detailed. The various bags were immediately subjected to examination, when it was found that the padlock and key had been retained by the letters and bankers' parcels been abstracted, but in some cases the "bills" on which all registered letters and valuable parcels are entered were also missing, so that it is at present impossible to ascertain the plunder from them. As a precautionary measure, information was forwarded by the Post-office authorities to the various City banking-houses, so that they might be put upon the discovery of the robberies. At the same time active measures were taken in order to obtain a clue to the depredators; and in the course of the morning Mr Seymour Clarke, superintendent of the Great Western railway, in company with two officers, made a visit to the Post-office for Bristol, in order to investigate the affair.

In the afternoon Mr Whitty was engaged, with several of his officers, on matters connected with the above affair, information having been received of a second robbery precisely similar in character—perpetrated on the down mail, which left London at seven o'clock on the same evening. The mail-bags on one side of this conveyance were perfect safe on the arrival of the train at Bristol, at a quarter past one, A.M. On the bags being opened at Bridgewater, a scene similar to that which presented itself at Bristol presented itself. Both bags were more or less mutilated and disturbed, and the more valuable contents abstracted therefrom. Happily, in this instance, the virtuance of the parties in charge of the train resulted in the capture of two of them, and there seems great reason to believe that the persons who committed the robbery were also the perpetrators of the second.

The parties alluded to are a man and a respectable appearance, both of whom travelled in a first-class carriage, occupying the next compartment to the Post-office tender. The Great Western carriages have a division in the centre, by which means each compartment is made to form a distinct carriage, as it were, so that no one of this compartment, next the down platform, a gentleman, who stept throughout the journey and is known to be a respectable solicitor, was seated alone. The other side was occupied by the two individuals in question, who had taken care to draw down the blinds of the door of the compartment. Their implication in the affair has placed beyond all manner of doubt by the discovery of a large sized letter and bill-case, the parcels in the carriage in which they rode, undoubtedly upon their apprehension, they were conveyed to Exeter, to be brought up for examination before the magistrates.

The presumption now entertained by those best calculated to form an opinion is that both robberies were effected in the same manner, viz., by parties who rode in a first class carriage next to the Post-office tender. The bags on the down mail, on the train arriving at the Bristol terminus, are thrown from the tender, and then in several carriages in succession, and remain on the platform until they can be to the door, which they cannot be till after they were previously prepared to unload. This would be little difficulty to overcome. The under is always well lighted by a lamp suspended from the centre of the roof, and having once obtained entrance, an expert thief would speedily abstract the booty. In addition to the letters found, a woolstapler's book—which it is supposed was used by the thieves to hang on to the bags—was discovered in the first-class carriage—was also discovered. The ledge along which they must have walked, to obtain entrance to the tender, is only an inch and a half wide. There were a few observed two black marks or dots on the left side of the carriage, and a pair of false moustachios upon one of the two parties apprehended.

The impudence of the second robbery, immediately following that of the first, is unconceivable. It can only be described as one of those short-sighted acts by which offenders against the law very often bring themselves within its meshes. Had the latter known, as in the first, that the mail-bags were left by clerks who travel with the up mail to Bristol with the down mail to Bridgewater, probably they would have been content with their first plunder, and escaped for some time, at least, with impunity.

Doubtless, in future, if the bags from the post-office must continue to be placed in a tender, a guard will be appointed to travel with them.

EXAMINATION OF THE ROBBERS.—The prisoners, Pollard, Exeter, the parties against whom suspicions were brought before the magistrates on Tuesday, and the evidence of Mr. Barlow, one of the Directors of the Great Western Company, was also examined, from London to Bristol, on the down train with the prisoners, of the guards, and of other railway officers, establishing the facts above mentioned, as received.—One of the prisoners refused to give his name, and a gentleman known in connection with the Great Western Railway Company, some time in the service of the Great Western Railway Company as a guard. They were remanded until Saturday (this day)

None of the property pointed from the up mail has yet been found. One of the registered letters stolen from this mail, it is stated, contained £4000, and the loss, so far as at present known, unquestionably amounts to fifty times that sum. Colonel Maberly, the Secretary of the Post-Office, and Mr Peacock, the Post-office solicitor, are engaged in arranging full development of the transaction.

In another part of the paper will be found an engraving which represents a mail-train as it appeared on the Great Western Railway, and its contrast, the old "stage coach" of other days.

A MELODRAMATIC SMUGGLER.—A few days ago, at the Plymouth police court, François Melending, a Frenchman, was charged with smuggling half a pint of French brandy. One of the constables, who had been watching the quay the night before, while the defendant and others came on shore, suspecting Melending, he seized him, and upon his melodramatic start, he thought he had found something of value. Upon searching, he found a pound or more coin, only. The officer, fearing that the wound would be fatal, sent for a surgeon, but to his own surprise, from the [illegible] he found a bladder, which had been full of brandy, but now had emptied of its contents by the ruthless knife. [illegible] to the late surgeon who now produced it. A glass of brandy was then handed round, which was tasted by the officer and the defendant [illegible] stated, through his interpreter, that he did not look like being drowned, and requested the favour of handing a glass. The glass was handed to him, with a similar observation, he placed it to his lips, but soon found it to be other than the glass of brandy. [illegible] from the moral rectitude which to the annals most of the Melendings. He exclaimed, "Ah! bon! bon! mon cognac." The defendant was fined 20s.

They occupied a long gallery of the palace, and consisted of every variety of article, from the highest works of art to the offering of the humble workman. The exhibition was a striking proof of the respect and affection which the Prussian people feel for the august couple.

An one of the superintendents at the general terminus at Perth was recently crossing the Scottish Midland line, an engine at great speed came up and struck him down. Strange to say, he was laid so flat between the rails, that the engine passed over him without any of the wheels or underworks of the locomotive touching him. With the exception of his being severely cut in the face, and rendered for some time insensible from the shock, he sustained no other injury, and was able to go about his occupation the next day.

It is understood that a new commission is contemplated to inquire into the state of the law respecting the letting and management of ecclesiastical property, with a view to legislation on this important subject. The matters to be investigated are of themselves of a sufficiently extensive and complicated nature to require the deepest attention; and the persons selected for the task will not only interfere with the duties of the ecclesiastical Ecclesiastical Commission, but will be employed upon a field of labour and inquiry entirely distinct.

An extraordinary case of self-destruction has just occurred at Berlin. The clerk of a man was found in custody at daylight, by the constable on a sitting position, on one of the benches in the Tiler Garten. From an examination of it, it appeared that the man must have placed a small packet of gunpowder in his mouth, ignited it, and then blown his head to pieces.

The casualties of a bombardment are often strange enough. An English family, on returning to their house lately, at Messina, in Sicily, found the upper part ruined, and forty-one bombs and shells swalling them. On lighting a fire in one of the rooms the smoke would not ascend, and on having the chimney examined, a shell was found in it which had not exploded.

There are one or two facts of which it may be proper to remind our readers at this season, namely, that the January dividends at the Bank are payable on the 5th; and that before the 5th fire insurance policies due at Christmas must be paid.

(a) This move, we have played very ill to advance his K P at this point, because of the advantage it subsequently gives to Black with his Queen at her 5th after the exchange of Pawns.

(b) Black has certainly well played, since it saves at all easy to see how White can possibly save the loss of his two minor pieces for the Rook.

(c) Closing an apparently the only outlet for White's Kt.

(d) It was this mode of escape White foresaw when he took the K B Pawn, and which doubtless has in some measure influenced his subsequent play, and a clear Pawn, to say nothing of the intervening game of position.

8. P to Q 5th	Q Kt to Q 5th	16. Q takes Q (ch)	P takes Q

And Black wins.

(a) This was the dazzling game of the contest, and is unquestionably the worst played game of the whole. No one, indeed, acquainted with the best play of Captain Kennedy, could believe it possible that the foolish, purposeless combinations in Mr. Lowe's mind are of use in the tantalizing struggle of a match!

(b) An excellent move when the adverse Q P is not moved, but a very unsafe one in the present state of things.

(c) Even here the P was recoverable by 5. P to K Kt 4th, and then, 6. K B to K Kt 2d.

(d) Worse and worse. From this point, of course, the White game is lost beyond redemption.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE NEW GREAT COAT, &c.—We are informed that the projected improvement of the great coat, &c., which will reduce the weight upon the wearer by 5 lb., is the invention of Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, G.C.H., the Major-General commanding the south-west district. This coat will, in addition to its other advantages, form a part of a tent, which a few will complete in all its outward necessaries.

THE STRENGTH OF THE ARMY.—According to the last official returns, the army is composed of 7093 regimental officers on full pay, viz. 56 colonels, 266 lieutenant-colonels, 260 majors, 1827 captains, 2553 lieutenants, 1287 second lieutenants, ensigns, and cornets, 490 regimental staff officers, 185 surgeons, 249 assistant-surgeons, and 36 veterinary surgeons, and 163,145 non-commissioned officers and rank and file. This number includes 12, [illegible] cavalry, [illegible] guards, 13,807 artillery and engineers and marines, [illegible] and [illegible] 11,691 royal marines, [illegible] the Cape Mounted Rifles, which is included in the cavalry return.

The first ship commissioned this year was the Centaur steam-frigate (on the 1st instant), at Portsmouth, to carry the broad pendant of Commodore Arthur Fanshawe, C.B., to command in chief on the west coast of Africa, vice Sir Charles Hotham, coming home. The Centaur will have a poop, and a complement of 240 total. Captain Buckle will command her.

LOSS OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "MUTINE."—Official reports have reached the Admiralty of the wreck of the Mutine, 12, on the 21st ult., at Palestrina, about ten miles from Venice. The Commander had gone ashore with despatches, when a terrific gale came on. The lieutenant in charge, Mr. W. J. Curtis, tried every means to recover the ship at her anchors, by cutting away the masts; but, having parted with both chain-cable and hawser, a gun having been sent on to the lazer, to save his ship's company, he preferred to run the vessel on shore, when all the crew were saved, with the exception of four officers and one marine, who have been lost; viz. Edward Whiting (acting mate), drowned in a most gallant attempt to get on shore in the ship's yawl; Mr. Henry E. Charlton (acting mate), dead from exhaustion and intense cold; James Burke (assistant-surgeon), whose death was caused in a similar manner; James Bowse (carpenter), who fell out of the bowline-knot, as they were hauling him on shore, and was drowned; and Edward James (private, Royal Marines), found frozen to death on the beach. Lieutenant Newell, of the Ardent, it is said, the intrepid ability of Lieutenant Curtis during the whole affair. The Ardent, steam-vessel, Lieutenant-Commander Newell, has taken to Naples the officers and crew, who were, after the Mount-murrial as soon as landed, and were relieved from their distress, after which they were to be sent home. The Mutine is the second of the five experimental brigs that has been wrecked; for the Osprey, it will be remembered, was lost at New Zealand.

ONE of the projects lately presented to the French National Assembly, and intended as a substitute for the income-tax, is as follows:—1. All persons who shall use a dress coat (habit) shall pay a tax of 100 francs, to be collected within the first fortnight of January. 2. All persons who shall wear a shall pay twenty francs, payable in the same manner. 3. All persons who shall wear a frock coat (redingote) shall pay a tax of five francs, to be collected in the same manner. 4. The wearers of uniforms, civil or military, the blouse, the jacket, the cap, shall be exempt from taxes. This project has been referred to the Committee of Finance.

LOSS OF THREE PILOTS.—On Friday (last week) a Cowes pilot boat was seen standing off Freshwater Bay. It afterwards appeared that she had on board four men, one of whom, a Dual pilot, named Johnson, had been received into the Cowes boat from one of the Channel vessels, which he had piloted. Johnson wished to land in Freshwater Bay, and the small boat, with two sailors and himself, left the pilot boat for the purpose of coming ashore; but a powerful ground swell running into the bay, the boat was unhappily capsized, and the unfortunate mariners were drowned. Two of the bodies were picked up in the course of the evening, and the other next morning. The Cowes pilot, who witnessed the unfortunate accident, contrived to work his vessel, alone through the Needles, where he was met by another boat from Yarmouth, which he reached without further accident. The two Cowes sailors have left families, one of seven, and the other of eight children.

EMIGRATION.—PLYMOUTH, JAN. 2.—The Spartan, Captain Pain, from London, with about 120 passengers, left the Sound on Thursday last, for Adelaide and Port Philip. The Ambassador, Captain Burn, from London, having on board 84 free emigrants, sailed for Hobart Town on the same day. The Lady Amherst, Captain Mylrid, is now in the Sound, taking on board her passengers; she will take in 180 adults, and not in a day or two for Sidney. The Lord Metcalfe, of London, Captain Sparks, is daily expected; 164 free emigrants are waiting here at the depôt, and when these are put on board she will sail direct for South Australia. The John Mitchell, a private passenger-ship, from London, is now in the Sound, and will sail for Adelaide to-morrow, should the weather prove favourable. The Sir George Seymour, Capt. Millman, is hourly expected from London, and the emigrants, who are nearly all free, are ready to be put on board. The Pemberton, from London, is expected on Monday next; she will take 340 unmarried females from Ireland to Sidney. The Incomstant, a fine vessel, now casting in the port, will take another batch of unmarried women to Adelaide early in February.

THE "MEANEE" LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP.

A BOMBAY Correspondent has favoured us with the following account of the launch of this magnificent vessel

In March, 1840, Sir James Graham, the First Lord of the Admiralty, in giving a statement of the strength of the Royal Navy, mentioned that there were two line-of-battle ships then building in India, but which had not at that time been named, leading to the inference that there were on the point of coming on the strength of the navy. The Meanee was not laid down till two years afterwards. The other line-of-battle ship is not named; and notwithstanding there has been given that no more vessels will for the present be built in India for her Majesty's service. In 1841 and 1842 three sets of ships were built, and the construction of line-of-battle ships. Enormous quantities of teak had for some time before this been collecting for the use of [illegible] dockyard, the 84-gun steam-frigates Semiramis (1105 tons, and 360-horse power) and the Feroze (1500 tons, and 400-horse power) being in process of construction, along with the liner already named, and the brigs Jumna and Nerbudda

The keel of the Meanee, or, as she was originally intended to be called, the Madras, having been laid some time previous to the year 1849, the usual ceremony of driving the silver nail into the keel was performed in November, in presence of the Governor, Sir George Arthur, and his Lady; the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Thomas Mc[illegible], and his family; the Superintendent of the Indian Navy, Sir R. Oliver; the Judges of the Supreme Court, and other distinguished persons in the Presidency. The ceremony consists in driving a silver nail, with a silver hammer, into the stern of the ship, with sundry invocations to the native language, calling for the blessings of the Almighty on the future ship. The head builder immediately afterwards covers the head of the nail with a wooden plug. The ceremony concludes by the Governor conferring a present of shawls on the master-builder and his chief assistants, with betel nut and leaves ornamented, and rose-water sprinkled over those present, to whom bouquets of flowers are also presented by the master builder.

The building of this magnificent vessel now proceeded steadily and auspiciously, and as rapidly as circumstances could be supposed to proceed. In 1840, Mr. Layhard, ship-builder to her M jesty, and his assistant, Mr. Bilfield, arrived in Bombay with plans from the lords of the Admiralty, and managed all the arrangements. These gentlemen having found it necessary in 1843 and 1846 to return to England because of sickness, were succeeded by Mr. Turner and his assistant, Mr. Ladd, under whom matters were brought to an auspicious conclusion in November, 1848. Mr. Ladd was also appointed by the Admiralty at the same time to building or repairing ships of war. The Meanee was originally named the Madras; on Lord Ellenborough being appointed First Lord of the Admiralty, and Sir Robert Fe[illegible] Governor, after his return to the latter state of Madras, had been prepared before the alteration occurred, and still remains, though no longer appropriate to a vessel.

At Bombay, spring tides rise to the height of sixteen and eighteen feet during the day and night, repeatedly long highest during the day, when the sun is to the north of the line, or from April to September, and during the night when the sun is to the south of it, from September to April, or during the cold weather season. The arrangements requiring to be made for the launch of such a ship were so many and so complex, that the day-tide was fixed on for this occasion, and it turned out low by nearly two feet than the night tide; as it was considered, and as it appeared correctly, that there would even with this be water quite sufficient to float off the ship, the 11th of November was accordingly fixed on for the great operation in question. On the day preceding the vessel was raised off her blocks, and placed in the cradle; some 2000 tons of [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] water, she scarcely occasioned any ruffle or surge, and that no swell or perturbation was apparent as the sea closed up behind her; though some three thousand tons of water must have been displaced by her, the displacement was so gently effected as scarcely to occasion a swell. After the launch was over, a party of about three hundred partook of an elegant déjeûné, provided for them by Commodore Hawkins. All the arrangements were as perfect as might be, and the most made, by the excellence of the accessories, of a spectacle which in itself was peculiarly imposing. The following are the dimensions of the Meanee:

	Feet	Inches
Length of the Gun Deck	186	6
Ditto of Keel for Tonnage	155	3
Extreme Breadth	50	0
Breadth for Tonnage	46	9
Ditto Moulded	45	3
Depth in Hold	23	4
Burthen .. .. about 2600 Tons.

In person, Cursetjee Rustomjee is of the middle height, with a remarkably pleasing and intelligent countenance, and possesses great activity, notwithstanding his increasing years (his age being 63). He is deservedly treated with the greatest consideration by the Government that he has for so long a period faithfully served.

With respect to the noble 80-gun ship, of which there are two Views, the Meanee, although a superintendent was appointed by the Lords of the Admiralty (Mr. George Turner), with an assistant (Mr. William Ladd), to overlook the work and give the lines, the whole of the laborious part of the building of the ship was performed under the directions of Cursetjee Rustomjee and his assistants, Jehangeer and Herjeebhoy. The Meanee is built of packed timber, and very highly finished.

We are indebted for the accompanying Views and Portrait to Daguerréotypes, cleverly taken by Mr. A. J. Roussac, of Bombay.

THE FARSEE HEAD BUILDER

Cursetjee Rustomjee Waddia of the Honourable Company's Dockyard, Bombay, was born in 1783; and entered the yard under his uncle, Framjee, then Master Builder, in 1800, as an apprentice in the shipwrights' line. He was promoted to Fourth Assistant Builder in 1805, in which capacity he had the superintendence (in conjunction with the other assistants) of all ships building and repairing in the Bombay docks. In 1812 he was raised to the situation of Second Assistant; and, in 1817, to that of First Assistant. In 1821 became Second Builder, and as such, in 1831, received, as a mark of approbation, from the Honourable Court of Directors, a silver rule, in token of their estimation of the value of his services; and, finally, in 1844, was promoted to the very responsible situation of Head Builder at Bombay; his services embracing thus a period of nearly half a century.

CURSETJEE RUSTOMJEE, HEAD BUILDER OF THE H. E. I. COMPANY'S DOCK AND SHIP BUILDING YARD AT BOMBAY.

In the course of this period upwards of one hundred large and small ships have been built for the Honourable Company, whilst for the service of the Crown there have been no less than ten line-of-battle ships, five frigates, and six brigs, also for his Highness the Imaum of Muscat one line-of-battle ship, two frigates, and five sloops, besides numerous vessels for the merchant service.

On the occasion of driving the silver nail in her Majesty's brig Goshawk (afterwards Norbudda), he had the satisfaction of receiving a silver hammer from one of the senior members of the Government, the Honourable Mr. Jugues Henry Crawford.

THE LAMB AND FLAG RAGGED SCHOOLS, CLERKENWELL.

THE Committee of this excellent Institution having decided again to appeal to the subscribers for funds to enable them to furnish the children with a good Old English entertainment, accordingly set on foot a subscription the same time announcing that the balance would be appropriated towards the establishment of an Infant School. The result of this appeal to the good-feeling of the public at this season of hospitality has exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its promoters; for it is stated, that, after paying all expenses, the balance will be sufficiently large to induce the Committee at once to establish an Infant Day-school. Among the subscribers to this fund are Lords Ellesmere, Ashley, and Harrowby; Mr. Justice Erle; George Hitchcock, Esq.; Messrs. Nicholson, of St. John-street, distillers; H. B. Ker, Esq., &

Tuesday, the 2nd, was appointed for the Christmas festival, and all was bustle and animation in the miserable courts and alleys surrounding the Schools. The three School-rooms were tastefully decorated for the occasion; and conspicuously were displayed some handsome maps, objects in natural history, &c., presented to the Schools by the Committee of Council on Education; while the silk banner of the institution, the gift of a member of the Committee, with its motto, "Ecce Agnus illa Dei," suggested to the contemplative mind feelings of the most grateful character to the Giver of all Good for the origin of an institution so well calculated, under his blessing, to train up the children of the poor in the way they should go.

The following was the bill of fare.—190 lb. of fine roast beef, 12 plum puddings of 16 and 18 lb weight each, 2 cwt. of the best potatoes, 9 gallons of table ale, bread, &c. The puddings were composed of 77 lb of plums, 25 lb. of currants, 7 lbs. of candid peel, 1 gallon of milk, 14 lb. of spice, 10 quarterns of flour, 8 lb. of bread, 240 eggs, and 24 lb of suet.

At twelve o'clock the children began to assemble; by one no less than 296 were seated; and a most gratifying spectacle it was to behold these poor children all decently clad—here and there some poor tattered and shoeless child proclaimed the nature of the institution in which they were assembled; but all were clean, forming a most powerful contrast to the state they were in before the schools were established.

The children being seated, and prayer having been offered to the Giver of all Good, they chaunted grace before meat with admirable precision; and in a few minutes all were engaged in despatching the good things before them; the lads of the committee, teachers, and friends rendering all the assistance in their power to the enjoyment of their poor fellow-creatures.

Dinner being ended, and the children having chanted grace after meat, they were briefly addressed by Mr Watts, the superintendent, who pointed out the great advantage of attending school, and of cultivating a religious education. The proceedings terminated by the children singing "God Save the Queen," each child being presented, on leaving the School, with a penny, as "a Christmas-box."

In the evening the children were again assembled to witness the exhibition of a magic lantern on moral and religious subjects, accompanied with suitable remarks by Mr. Stephen Shirley, of Drury-lane, who, unsolicited, placed his services at the disposal of the committee. And thus ended the third Annual Festival of the Lamb and Flag Ragged Schools.

"THE LAMB AND FLAG" RAGGED SCHOOLS.

THE CIRQUE NATIONAL, AT DRURY-LANE.

THE very clever performances of the equestrian troupe from the Champs Elysées, now at Drury-lane, are attracting nightly crowded and fashionable audiences; and the "Clowns of the Ring" bring down as hearty bursts of laughter as their clever confrères in the pantomimes. Although there is not much that is absolutely new to an English audience in the acts of horsemanship or drollery, yet the neat style in which everything is done—the attention to little matters—and the exceeding beauty of the costumes (depending generally more upon taste than spangles for their effect) produce an ensemble that cannot fail to attract. Mdlle. Caroline and Mdlle. Palmyre Anato are charming representatives of the different schools of equestrian performances; and M. Weil and the Siegrists (an entire family) are daring to an almost fearful degree.

The forces combined are seen to the best advantage in an act called "La Lutte des Voltigeurs," which we have this week represented, and in which the new addition to the company, Mahomed Ben Said, performs some marvellous leaps and somersaults. The effect they produce in rapidly flying over the horse, one after another, until a continuous circle of vaulters is formed, is really exciting, and brings down thunders of applause.

The protéques Messrs. Auriol, father and son, and Leclair—fill up the intermediate time, between the different acts, with great éclat. Those who have not seen the latter performer strive to pick up his handkerchief, when he is upon stilts, and supposed to be slightly intoxicated, have still a hearty laugh in store.

A word for little Marie Anato, who is an exceedingly graceful dancer on horseback; and also for the general arrangements, which, under the superintendance of M. Dejean, are as perfect as could be desired.

"LA LUTTE DES VOLTIGEURS," AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

CHARLES LAMB'S HOUSE,

COLEBROOK-ROW, NEAR ISLINGTON.

THIS was Charles Lamb's holiday house, the scene of the first substantial enjoyment of leisure, on his emancipation from the desk at the India House, and that routine of drudgery of which, in his own way, he writes thus:—"Confusion blast all mercantile transactions, all traffic, exchange of commodities, intercourse between nations, all the consequent civilization and wealth, and amity, and link of society, and getting rid of prejudices, and knowledge of the face of the globe, and rot the very firs of the forest, that look so romantic alive, and die into desks." This event occurred in 1825, and with the accompaniment of a handsome pension, the entire control of his own time, and a new sense of independence, may well be supposed to have proved, at first, somewhat perplexing, after the routine of Leadenhall-street, and the matter of fact entries of those "merchants and their spicy drugs, which are so harmonious to sing of." "The incomprehensibleness of my condition," he says, "overwhelmed me. It was like passing from life into eternity. Every year to be as long as three, that is to have three times as much real time—time that is my own—in it. I wandered about, thinking I was happy, but feeling I was not. But that tumultuousness is passing off, and I begin to understand the nature of the gift. Holidays, even the annual month, were always uneasy joys, with their conscious fugitiveness, the craving after making the most of them. Now, when all is holiday, there are no holidays. I can sit at home, in rain or shine, without a restless impulse for walkings. I am daily steadying, and shall soon find it as natural to me to be my own master as it has been irksome to have had a master." Lamb had but little enjoyment in the country: his paradoxical genius had a proneness to convert poetical things into matters of fact, as it had to elevate the common-place into something which, by its rackness and geniality, was near akin to poetry

Colebrook-row seems a spot ordained for Lamb, and it has just sufficient of the rus in urbe, without too much to separate it from a neighbourly character. There is a tree, but it is a true London willow—something not unlike that which grows upon a dinner-service of the "willow pattern." The waters, too, of the New River, which flows close by, are not of a volume to oppress the mind by its immensity, and here they are trimly carbed by a border of brickwork; one side affording a pleasant walk along its limpid margin, or where the disciples of Walton enjoy the harmless part of the angler's recreation, in patiently watching a tranquil float. Here Lamb enjoyed his dearly-earned leisure, with that sister who is known to the indifferent reader merely as Bridget Elia, and whose part in the Holborn tragedy only endeared her the more to him, in compassion for the mental disorganisation that precipitated it, while it brought out the generous and manly qualities of his nature, in the protection which her helplessness demanded; an act well repaid by a life of affection and kindly association afterwards.

The rails shown in the Cut (opposite the house) are those which Lamb had set up directly after, under his own careful inspection, in order to prevent the repetition of such a catastrophe for the future. The house is scarce y changed since Charles Lamb passed what may be considered the pleasantest portion of his life in it, and from this place issued some of the raciest of those conceits, and rare combinations of heterogeneous whims and fancies, which—sparkling in his matchless correspondence—give an importance to the most ordinary topics, and shed a grace over whatsoever they embody.

A NEW ANIMAL.—M. Antoine d'Abbadie, writing to the Athenæum, rom Cairo, gives the following account of an animal new to European science, w hich account he received from Baron Von Müller, who had recently returned to that city from Kordofan:—"At Meigen, in Kordofan," said the Baron, "we are I stopped some time to make my collections, I met on the 17th of April, 1846, a man who was in the habit of selling to me specimens of animals. One day he asked me if I wished also for an A'naas, which he described thus:—'It is of the size of a small donkey, has a thick body and thin bones, coarse hair, and tail like a boar. It has a long horn on its forehead, and lets it hang when alone, but erects it immediately on seeing an enemy. It is a formidable weapon; but I do not know its exact length. The A'naas is found not far from bero (Melpes), towards the S.S W. I have seen it often in the wild grounds, where the negroes kill it, and carry it home to make shields from its skin.' —N.B. This man was well acquainted with the rhinoceros, which he distinguished under the name of Fertit from the A'naas. On June 14 I was at Kursi, also in Kordofan, and met there a slave merchant who was not acquainted with my first informer, and gave me spontaneously the same description of the A'naas, adding that he had killed and eaten one not long before, and that its flesh was well-flavoured." "Herr Rüppell and M. Fresnel," adds M. d'Abbadie, "have already spoken of a one-horned African quadruped; and I have also some notes which tend to establish the existence of, perhaps, two different kinds."

BLACKWALL EXTENSION RAILWAY BRIDGE

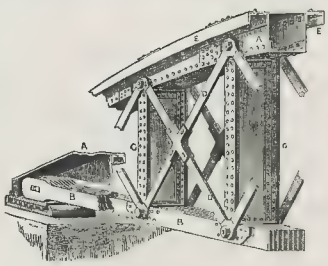
OVER THE COMMERCIAL-ROAD EAST.

AN interesting festival, in celebration of the completion of Mr. Brassey's contract on the railway works of the Blackwall Extension, was held at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, on Wednesday last. Joseph Locke, Esq., M.P., presided, supported by the Chairman and Directors of the Blackwall Company, the East and West India Dock Railway Company; W. Chaplin, Esq. M.P.; R. D. Mangles, Esq., M.P., and a large number of gentlem en interested in railway business. Mr. H. E. Burt officiated as Vice-President.

The object of this new link in the metropolitan system of railways is to bring the Eastern Counties and other lines, now terminating at Shoreditch, more immediately into the City, which is effected by a branch from the old Blackwall Railway at Stepney, to join the Eastern Counties line at Old Ford.

We have engraved the most remarkable work—the Bridge by which the line crosses the Commercial-road East.

The peculiar construction of this Bridge will be understood by reference to the annexed diagram. The front end shows a section through the trussed girder at 1, 2 (see large view). The strength of the Bridge depends upon the rib or arch A A, and the tie-bars B B, by which the extremities are held together. The vertical stays, or pendant (C C), support the tie-bars (B B), and connect and distribute the weight of the floor equally throughout the entire arch; they also give great longitudinal and transverse firmness to the structure. The diagonal braces, D D, prevent undue deflexion when the girder is unequally loaded. The arch is strengthened laterally by the overhanging of the top rail, E E. The whole arch and stays are constructed of hollow-plates and angle iron. The tie-bars are each 8 inches wide, and 1 inch thick, and as many are used as will bear the requisite strain. One foot of the arch is fixed in the masonry, but the other as is shown, is fitted with a sliding shoe on rollers, to admit of expansion, &c.



It was constructed by Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co., under the direction of Mr. Lock, M.P.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

SHEFFIELD, ROTHERHAM, BARNSLEY, WAKEFIELD, HUDDERSFIELD, AND GOOLE RAILWAY.—Since the meeting of this company, last week, at Wakefield, for altering and modifying the terms of lease to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company, the directors, at the request of the proprietors, issued, on Saturday last, a financial statement of the company's affairs, from which it appears that the total payments, as per agreement at the Railway Clearing, amount to £73,738, and, together with subsequent payments of £21,420, to a total of £95,158. The future liabilities of the company, under the contract, are as follows:—Messrs. Miller and Co.'s contract for works, including all contingencies, £146,234; less amount paid, £54,412; total, £91,843—to which are to be added, land agreed for, £4201; material for permanent way, timber, rails, &c., £7,691; interest on sinking fund, £4883; directory, £200; engineering, £4700; making a total of £127,967. The estimated future liabilities not under contract are:—solicitors' charges, £500; land agreed for and compensations, £11,841; office charges, £500; material for permanent way, and cost of stations, not contracted for, £18,000—total, £30,331; or a grand total of £251,456. The directors observe, that as this exposition they have distinguished the liabilities which are of certain amount, from their being under special contract, from those to which some contingency may attach. The amount of items under the latter head is so comparatively small as to call for little or no remark; and that the estimated expense of £2,000/. for which the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company's guarantee of 5 per cent. and half-profits provides, will be more than sufficient for the completion of the entire works of the railway, which they calculate the contractor will have no difficulty in accomplishing by December next, if supplied with the necessary funds.

EAST LOTHIAN.—The shareholders intend to apply, next session of Parliament, for a dissolution of their company.

FRENCH RAILWAY REGULATIONS.—The Central Railway Committee has ordered that for the future the various companies shall adopt the system of communication established on the Orleans and Verron lines, between the conductors who sit behind and the engine-men in front. This system consists in placing behind the tender a species of sentry-box, facing the driving-seat and wagons, with whom the other conductors placed at the extremity of the train are to correspond by means of a flag during the day, and a coloured lantern by night. In case of any signal of an accident, the conductor near the tender, shall consequently close to the engine-man, can ring an a arm-clock.

THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY AND PERIODICAL PASSENGER TICKETS.—The following statement is circulated among the season regular passengers on this line has been published:—"Certain resolutions were passed at a meeting of railway passengers on the 18th Dec., held at the Hero of Waterloo Tavern, the month of which conveys the resolution of those attending, the meeting: "That they will support and adopt, as far as possible, other modes of traveling, if a more reasonable dealing with the public cannot be maintained. MOSAIC JUST ADDED TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM COLLECTION.

MOSAIC AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THIS beautiful specimen of Mosaic has lately been brought from Athens, and has been presented to the Museum by Mr. Hudson Gurney. It is placed in the central Grand Saloon of Antiquities.

When received in this country the slab was broken, but it has been very carefully restored by Sir Richard Westmacott. It measures 8 feet by 7 feet 6 inches, and bears the representation of a Water Deity. (Jupiter Pluvius.) The general colour is a reddish brown; but the hair and beard are dark green, and resembles sea-weed.

The Museum has been closed during the past week for the usual vacation, but will be re-opened on Monday next, the 8th. During the four days the Museum was open in Christmas week, the number of visitors amounted to 37,260: of which, on Tuesday, the number were 12,875; Wednesday, 14,435; Thursday, 2231; and Friday, 779; in all, 37,260, which, considering the shortness of the days and the inclemency of the weather, is a much larger number than usual.

M. T. BAINES, Esq.—We mentioned last week that Matthew Talbot Baines, Esq., Q.C., the eldest son of the late Edward Baines, Esq., of Leeds, had been appointed President of the Poor-Law Board, in the place of the late Charles Buller, Esq. Mr. Baines, who is one of the representatives of Hull, has since issued an address to the electors of that borough. He says:—"The office upon which I am about to enter has been offered to me spontaneously. It has not been sought or solicited by me in any way whatever, and, least of all, has it been earned by any political subserviency, unworthy alike of you and myself. I have accepted it, not because I was ignorant of the difficulties and labours by which it is and ever must be attended, but because I thought it presented opportunities of doing good, which I could not have hoped for in a merely private station. * * Should I have the honour of being re-elected, I may promise myself the pleasure of being able to do this more efficiently hereafter, inasmuch as I shall no longer be obliged to absent myself from London during any part of the session of Parliament (which the pursuit of my profession has hitherto rendered necessary), but shall always be upon the spot to watch over your interests and to promote them by every means in my power." The election will not take place until after the meeting of Parliament.

THE POPE AND THE BELGIANS.—The Belgians are circulating a respectful address to his Holiness Pope Pius IX., dated Christmas-day, in which, after reminding the Pope of the respect, submission, and loyalty evinced by the Belgians at all times for his Holiness, they highly deprecate recent events, which compelled him to flee from the patrimony inherited from St. Peter; and offer their persons and property, in order to re-establish, wholly and intact, the exercise of the spiritual and temporal authority of the Holy See. In any other [illegible] this, every true Catholic [illegible] such acts, and would have come [illegible] quarter under Heaven to re-establish the Pope [illegible] rights. They entreat him, in conclusion, to extend [illegible] reduction to his faithful Belgian children, and that hand from which the Angel of the Lord caused the chalds to fall, in the night in which he led him through the midst of the guards who were watching him in his captivity. This address was got up, in the first instance, by Count L. T. Ratsbon, of Boortsick. It has already obtained numerous signatures.

EXTRAORDINARY TELEGRAPH FEAT.—President Polk's cumbrous Message, containing upwards of 50,000 words (!), was flashed all the way from Baltimore to St. Louis in twenty-four hours, and this, too, with the minutest punctuation mark in the document. Copies were also dropped, on the way, at York, Harrisburg, Carlisle, Chambersburg, Bedford, and Pittsburg, in Pensylvania; Massillon, Cleveland, Zanesville, Columbus, Dayton, and Cincinnati, in Ohio; Madison and Evansville, in Indiana; Louisville, in Kentucky; and Saline, in Illinois. The gentlemen who accomplished this wonderful mental, mechanical, and electrical feat are Messrs. O'Reilly, of the Atlantic and Lake Telegraph Company, and H. J. Rogers, of the American Telegraph Company, who wished to prove beyond all cavil that the lightning line can be made available for the transmission of large documents as well as for short messages, and we think they have pretty well satisfied the public of their ability to do it. Messrs Reddish and Hough, of Philadelphia, connected with the O'Reilly line, were detained for the most important part of the duty to be performed, that of writing the entire document in Baltimore. Their arduous task was begun on Tuesday, shortly after the Message came to hand, and at a few minutes before two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon finished their almost Herculean undertaking at which hour the signature of James K. Polk, and the Washington date, were written as plainly and legibly as the caption had been 24 hours previously. The two operators were at work, relieving each other occasionally, during the entire time, with the exception of a couple of hours, when they were interrupted by a storm at the western end of the line.—New York Express

WRECK OF THE "GLENBERVIE" WEST INDIAMAN

ON Saturday morning, the 23d ult., the ship Glenbervie, 390 tons register, left Bathurst Basin, Bristol, for the purpose of proceeding to Newport, there to take in a cargo of coals on a return voyage to the Havannah.

The captain at first took a pilot; but the crew being all his own countrymen, and not very readily understanding English, the pilot said he must have an assistant. The captain refused to comply, and the pilot, accordingly, would not undertake the charge of the vessel; when the captain told him that he might go ashore, for he (the captain) could manage without him. The pilot then left; but the captain had not got his vessel much below the toll-gate, when she took the mud off Acraman's works, and soon heeled over, losing her masts, and blocking up the navigation. Every effort was made to raise her, but, for a long time, without success; we learn, however, that she has since been raised, and taken into Cumberland Basin to repair.

The charge for an assistant pilot would have been 3s. or 4s.; the expense of raising and repairing the Glenbervie will cost, probably, more than as many hundred pounds, to say nothing of the inconvenience and loss of time.

The vessel was grounded on a slip of mud and stones, represented by the dark mass abreast of her. She remained fast, as the tide was falling rapidly: and when the tide had almost left her dry, she fell over; her masts broken off by contact with the opposite bank of the New Cut. It should be observed that she ought not to have been taken down this river, or rather the New Cut—which is not the usual channel for large vessels, but for coasters and small craft only.

ANCIENT FONT IN ST. JAMES'S CHURCH, TAUNTON.

THIS curious baptismal vessel, after having been for many years half hidden in a recess in the wall of the south-west corner of St. James's Church, at Taunton, has just been removed to be placed in a position in which its sculptural enrichment is seen to proper advantage.

In form this Font is octagonal: it is of Gothic design, and each compartment has canopied niches, filled with statuary. Three of the compartments are so mutilated as not to be deciphered, but these are to be carefully restored after the pattern of the other five, which are in very fair preservation. The massive pedestal that supports the basin is also octagonal, and is decorated with bold-sculptured quatrefoils; and in the centre of each is a boss. The rim of the basin (above the figures) is ornamented with a row of quatrefoils. The base or steps no longer remain.

If we except the hexagonal form, the octagonal is the most usual in which fonts occur: the latter is the most appropriate, as well as the most beautiful. It is symbolical, according to the ancient method of spiritualising numbers, of the new birth in baptism, the seven days creation of the natural world being symbol sed by the number 7, and the new creation by Christ by the number 8, in allusion to the eighth day on which He rose again from the dead.

The Font is evidently of the same age as the church, which was built in the 13th century. Two of the figures on the Font correspond with the remaining two in the niches of the tower, which are supposed to be St. Peter and St. James, or St. Peter and St. Jague. Very accurate drawings of the Font and its ornamental ornaments have been made by Mr. A. A. Clarke, the clever artist, of Taunton, who has obligingly forwarded the Sketch whence the annexed representation has been engraved.

We hope to hear of this fine Gothic relic being perfectly restored, and placed upon steps in its fitting place, near the principal entrance of the church. The Font has been very badly treated, not so much by the Puritans of old as by the apathists of modern days, who have suffered the vessel to be much mutilated in its various shiftings: at one period it was placed near the altar, next under the organ gallery, and then, as if it took up too much room for the great pews, it was thrust back into the south-west corner of the church, in a deep recess in the wall. A better taste has, however, been shown of late among the parishioners, an enlightened few having taken up the restoration of the Font, which we hope will be efficiently executed.

The figures can with care be de[illegible]. The figure of Saint James the ANCIENT FONT AT TAUNTON.

Greater appears with staff and scrip, on the right hand of the Sketch, and corresponds with a figure of St. James, the patron Saint of the church, which round is in a niche in the tower. Figures of St. Bartholomew, St. James the Less, and St. Thomas, likewise appear in the portion of the Font shown in the Sketch. Upon one of the panels or faces is sculptured the Crucifixion; but it is much defaced. St. James's was originally the conventual church of the priory of the order of St. Augustine; but the only or principal portion remaining of the ancient structure is the square tower, to which we have referred.

THE FINANCIAL REFORM MOVEMENT.

THE Financial Reformers have at length taken the field in earnest. The tracts of the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, and the letter of Mr. Cobden to the Chairman of that body—themselves but the signs and results of a steady public opinion pointing in the same direction—have prepared the country to expect that some constitutional agitation would be shortly commenced in furtherance of the great objects of economy and reduction of taxation. It was scarcely expected, however, that the old Anti-Corn-Law League—another in name, but the same in form and spirit—would be revived, to fight a new battle. Such, however, is the case. The agitation for an extension of the suffrage, and for a better adaptation of the representation to the present circumstances of the country, flashed in the pan during last summer, and was no more heard of. But the same parties are still active and vigorous. They professed only to desire political changes for the sake of securing good government. The events on the Continent, however, have proved so satisfactorily, to the great majority of thinking men in this country, that political changes—especially if they are of an extensive or organic kind—do not always produce good government, but very frequently the reverse, that the legislative reformers have been induced to change their tactics. They have seen that no merely political agitation, however excellent it might be in theory, is expedient at the present time. They have, therefore, taken their stand upon a wider and a better principle, and will endeavour to secure good government by means of the agencies which are constitutionally at their command. They have not formally renounced the intention to struggle for changes in the machinery of the Legislature: they would, we think, have shown more prudence, if they had done so. Whatever may be the anomalies of our legislative system—whatever may be urged against the absurdity of allowing as many representatives to Harwich as to Manchester, to Lymington as to Glasgow—whatever may be said for the ballot, or against it—for an extension of the suffrage, or for shortening the duration of Parliaments—there is no disputing the fact that, as a nation, we enjoy the blessings of rational freedom to a far greater extent than any other in Europe.

We can bear a few anomalies and absurdities—we can tolerate a Constitution that may not be theoretically perfect—if, in spite of the anomalies and absurdities, we are freer and happier than our neighbours; and if, notwithstanding the faults of its theory, the practical working of the Constitution is such as to secure to every man, freedom of thought, speech, and action within the limits of the law. The country, in fact, is averse from political changes, however loudly an extreme party may clamour for them. The hard-working merchants, manufacturers, and operatives of Lancashire and Yorkshire, in taking the lead in a new agitation for the reduction of expenditure, should confine themselves to that one great and essential point, if they wish the country generally to second their efforts; and if they desire, as we must suppose they do, the success of the cause to which they have devoted themselves.

We dwell at length upon this part of the question, because, at the great meeting held at Manchester, with all the éclat and with all the machinery of the old Anti-Corn-Law League, we do not see that simplicity of plan which we trace in the tracts of the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, and in the letter and speeches of Mr. Cobden. Of the three resolutions passed at that assemblage, the first and the last were alone to the purpose in hand. The second was but a hankering after a new Reform Bill, which the country is at present in no mood to demand, and the enactment of which might not secure the important, if not vital, purpose which is the main plea and only justification of the present agitation. The first resolution, moved by Mr. Cobden, was—"That this meeting resolves to co-operate with the Liverpool Reform Association and other similar bodies, in their efforts to reduce the public expenditure to at least the standard of 1835, and to secure a more equitable and economical system of taxation." The third, moved by Mr. Bright, was to the effect that the meeting approved of the course pursued by the late Anti-Corn-Law League in the extension of forty-shilling freeholds, and their system of watching the registries, and authorised the formation of an association for carrying the present question by the same means. Now, an agitation for a reduction of expenditure, inaugurated by the first of these resolutions, and wrought out on the principles and by the agencies alluded to in the third, and strictly confined to these, is one, we think, which will command very extensive support throughout the country. Manufacturers and agriculturists, employers and employed, landowners and land occupiers, Whigs and Tories, Conservatives and Liberals, may all unite in a project for equalising the revenue and the expenditure of the country, and for increasing the number of bonâ fide forty-shilling freeholders. The object and the means are alike good. They are both desirable, both safe, and both strictly constitutional. But the second resolution of the Manchester meeting takes up a different ground, and has reference to a wholly different question. For that reason, we think the projectors of the meeting would have evinced more judgment if they had displayed more singleness of aim, and if they had postponed to a fitter time the consideration of topics which may excite animosity, and which cannot fail to excite difference of opinion. It was moved by Mr. Milner Gibson, and was to the effect, "That no permanent reduction of taxation could be effected until the people obtained a more direct control over the House of Commons by an extension of the system of electoral representation." If, by means of constitutional agitation and of the machinery alluded to in the third resolution, Financial Reform can be carried—as we think it can, and as the projectors of the meeting seem to think it can—why embarrass the question? Why repel men who might feel inclined to aid it? why run the risk of dissension, by introducing such a resolution as the second? As Mr. Cobden said, in his very effective speech, "We must have a simple point of faith, or we cannot march together." Let the Financial Reformers look to it in time. Let them take Mr. Cobden's advice. It was one point of faith, and simplicity and earnestness in adhering to it and struggling for it, that enabled the Anti Corn-Law League to triumph over all discouragements, to conquer all difficulties, to make converts of men in high places, and to establish their principle as the law of the land. The financial question is one of still greater simplicity. It will require the undivided energies of all its friends to carry it to a successful issue; and the circumstances of the country are such as to render it a question of more immediate urgency than the relaxation of our protective system could ever have been considered. Union is the one thing needful, and it is to be hoped that the Financial Reformers will not be seduced by any predilections however strong, any eloquence however impressive, any temptation however great, to mix up the question with others which are either irrelevant or inexpedient at the present time.

It appears that the Manchester meeting is to be the first of a series, and that the agitation has assumed a form which cannot fail to have a large influence upon the public mind, and upon the deliberations of Parliament, now so soon to re-assemble. We need not enter into any discussion of the various items in the bold plan put forward by Mr. Cobden in his now celebrated letter. We gave a list of them in our paper of last week. Mr. Cobden's speech at Manchester ran over the whole of them again, and was in the main rendered so familiar by his League orations [illegible] subsequently effective. The Hon. Gentleman as-

Anti-Corn-Law agitation, that so far from being [illegible]s, he was one of their best friends. He did [illegible] Sheffield [illegible] convention [illegible] the turners of the truth of the [illegible]ssertion, but now that he proposes a plan by which the land be entirely relieved of the burden of the Malt Tax, the farmers, we suspect, will be more inclined than formerly to believe in his professions, and to aid him in his objects. It is not, however, as a boon to any particular class that the success of this financial agitation should be desired. To reduce expenditure within just and proper limits—to put an end to waste and extravagance—to relieve the nation of taxes that interfere with the public health, injure the public morals, or cramp the national industry—is to confer a boon [illegible] lass alone, but on all classes.

It is strictly Conservative movement; and as such, without pledging ourselves to the details, or admiring Mr. Cobden's estimate of possible reduction as strictly correct and practicable, we wish it success. We have lived, as a nation, the life of the spendthrift for a period far too long. It is high time that we should turn over a new leaf, and "balance our ledger."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

There is little news of interest this week from our versatile neighbours. There were several rumours afloat during the week as to the probability of an impending Ministerial crisis, which were strengthened by the circumstance of M. Marrast, the President of the National Assembly, having paid a visit to the President of the Republic, with the object of offering the services of the Cavaignac-Marrast party to carry on the affairs of Government, instead of the present neutral section, to which the Odilon Barrot Cabinet belongs, or of the Bonapartist party, which recognises M. Thiers as its head, and which, it is expected, must shortly come into power, at least previous to the accession of the "pure Republicans," M. Marrast and his friends. The President, it is understood, declined M. Marrast's offer.

The affair of M. Léon de Malleville's retirement has occupied the journals a good deal, and formed the subject of a debate in the Chamber on Saturday, in the course of which M. de Malleville showed great moderation, and declared that [illegible] Cabinet would make no difference in his future position, both in affection and opinion with his late colleagues.

The following is the letter of Prince Louis Napoleon to M. Malleville, which caused the resignation of the latter:—

"Elysée.—Monsieur.—I have asked the Prefect of Police if he did not consider it necessary to open a correspondence by the mail in the affirmative, and has told me that he thought that the course of a despatch of this kind [illegible] articles which are essential to me: that was not done so under Louis Philippe, and it must not be so now. For these reasons, also, I have not caused the irregular despatches to be opened, a precaution very useful in the circumstances when I have names which would mean me as if the famous Constitution of Sieyes were in force; but I will not suffer it. Moreover, Monsieur le Ministre, I am aware of your sentiments of high delicacy.

"P.S.—I forgot to say that there are still at St. Lazare eighty women in a state of arrest, of whom only one has been brought before a council of war; that I have the right to have them set at liberty; for in this case I shall give the order at this very instant."

Petitions continue to pour in from all quarters of the country, calling upon the Legislative Assembly to dissolve.

On Monday, in the National Assembly, there was a discussion on foreign affairs, particularly in reference to the approaching Congress of Brussels, respecting the neutrality of Northern Italy, in the course of which an hon member said that the Congress was shamefully managed.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the Foreign Minister, declared, in reply, that the negotiations were actively and seriously commenced, notwithstanding the assertion of the hon member to the contrary. The Congress for the mediation would certainly take place; and the present Cabinet, like its predecessors, would endeavour to have the question of Italy settled by pacific means. Until the negotiations had got further, the Government would observe the most severe neutrality. His language [illegible] reminded the Assembly that the Provisional Government had transmitted two systems of policy—the one an open and pacific one, the other [illegible] and policy of intrigue. The present Cabinet would follow out the first, and would never descend to the second.

[illegible] to be admitted [illegible] M. de Lamartine to the tribune He considered, with the eloquence which is natural to him, that the policy proclaimed by the Minister was the result of well considered patriotism. In that [illegible] there was neither disloyalty nor agitation. It was a policy worthy of the Republic, its [illegible]nument, and the Assembly. This short speech was received with loud cheering.

The Commission [illegible] Agricultural Bill, adopted, by a large majority, the following project of decree:—

"Dating from Feb. 1, 1849, foreign [illegible] shall be admitted into France on the following conditions:—

On Tuesday, in the National Assembly, [illegible] annulled the election for Corsica of M. Louis Lucien Bonaparte, on the ground of irregularity. M. Lucien Bonaparte, who much resembles the Emperor, entered into explanations, and declared that he would [illegible] present himself to the electors for their votes, who would, he was sure, return him by a large majority.

The [illegible]s of Le Sage, whose arrival has been for some time expected, had not arrived [illegible] Government, has arrived in Paris; and [illegible] in the Constitutionnel that she is to do the honours of the President's palace [illegible] M. From Galita we learn that on Christmas Day, the Pope having celebrated the second mass in his private chapel, at which the King, Queen, and Royal Family of Naples assisted, and received the Holy Sacrament, his Holiness repaired in state to the cathedral, where he was received by the Bishop, at the head of the [illegible]. The [illegible] diplomatic body [illegible] were all in attendance [illegible] Ambassadors [illegible] afterwards. The Pope [illegible] mounted a chair [illegible] chapels, proceeded to the grand altar and [illegible] Divine Service [illegible] afterwards retired to the Bishop's Palace, which is contiguous to the church, and the [illegible] arrived in the same state to his residence, where, at noon, the diplomatic corps, which was joined by M. Creptovich, the Russian Ambassador at Naples, waited on his Holiness, and the Ambassador of Spain read to him an address to that [illegible] congratulations of his Holiness. The Pope having returned a suitable [illegible] corps diplomatique, afterwards paid its homages to the King and Queen of Naples, and ultimately visited the Senior Cardinal Bishop.

VENICE.—The Provisional Government of Venice has issued a decree, establishing a permanent Assembly of the representatives of the state of Venice, with the power of deciding upon everything relative to the [illegible] or external condition of the state. The representatives are elected by [illegible] universal suffrage, in the proportion to the population of 1 to 1500. All citizens 21 years of age and upwards are electors. The electors will [illegible] 20th of January, and the representatives will meet immediately [illegible] to last six months.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

The news from the seat of war is meagre, and is not always to be relied on; even the official bulletins of the military commanders being marked by a want of candour that is contemptible in the extreme.

The head quarters of Prince Windischgratz were on the 3rd inst. at Bicske, and on the 4th at Buda, about 12 miles from Ofen (Buda-Pesth), the capital of Hungary.

On the first-named day the Hungarian Parliament sent a deputation to the Prince's head-quarters at Buska. The Prince refused receiving them, and gave orders they should be made to understand, in a sort of unconditional surrender would stop the effusion of blood on either side.

After the battle of Moor, Jarom Jellacich brought his corps forward to Lovas Berenny. Ofen is consequently surrounded by the Austrian outposts on the right bank of the Danube.

At Vienna, General Welden had rendered the state of siege more stringent, in consequence of the political influence contained to be exhibited by the Viennese.

UNITED STATES.

The [illegible] from the United States by the Cambria, [illegible] is by no means so interesting or so voluminous as that received by the last mail; and in Congress there had occurred nothing decisive touching any branch of general affairs.

A committee had been ordered to report a bill to abolish the slave trade in the districts of Columbus.

There was no abatement in the gold mania; immense numbers were flocking in the direction of California.

Yellow fever was on the increase at New Orleans.

It is stated in a letter from Washington, that the postal arrangements had not been completed; there were yet some points of difference.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

We have received advices from Panama, to the 22nd of November. There was at that place her Majesty's schooner Bacchante, with stores and provisions for the surveying-ships Herald and Pandora: the first from the edge of the ice, where she had been in search of Sir John Franklin and his party; the other from Vancouver's Island and the Sandwich Islands. These vessels were expected at Panama momentarily. The California, the first of the American line of steamers to ply between the port of Panama and San Francisco, in California, was expected to arrive about the beginning of January, and would take the mails for the north-west coast, to be brought to Chagres by the first of another new line of steamers between New York and Panama, which thereafter became the general mail in the Pacific, whence would depart the steamers to these sixth as far as Valparaiso, and to the north up to Oregon, as from San Francisco there was to be a branch to the southward, also, and China and the Isle of Sandwich running the American lines to the westward. The rates to the Crescent City were to commence on the 1st of January; the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company having advanced the Government of New Granada a liberal sum for this purpose, the latter providing a corps of 200 sappers to do the work. The seaports on the Isthmus are free, and vessels could go into and remain in them free of duties. The duties on all goods arrived were reduced to the nominal rate of [illegible] of a real per lb. weight, or less than 1 per cent on the value of an assorted cargo. The only exception to that rate was on spirits, on which a duty of 11 reals per dozen bottles was imposed. Tobacco, cotton, &c., in bales, were not permitted to pass in transit. Clears could only be imported [illegible] high duty of 10 dollars per 1000. With the advantages of this Law and extensive means of communication diverging from a central point, there appeared to be a fair opening for business in Panama.

THE GOLD MINES IN CALIFORNIA.

The American Governor of California made a visit to the washings lately, and his suite were employed in collecting the nuggets and gold dust collected at 2,300,000 dollars a month by the present imperfect mode of working. As yet, the washing is free to the exertions of all who may choose or risk to seek their fortunes in New El Dorado. An eye-witness, just returned from the scene, describes the bands of wreckless desperadoes there collected as something horrible. They are more to be likened to bands of pirates than to anything else. The masters of vessels in the Bay of San Francisco find it impossible to retain their sailors on board: they all run away to the gold-washing, and the captain of a Chilian vessel was under the necessity of paying labourers in Ireland and to hire his vessel with a crew of his own. All the other resources of the country are abandoned for gold-washing. Flour, provisions, and goods have risen to extravagant prices; and immigrants are daily pouring across the Rocky Mountains continually in one unbroken stream of fortune-seekers.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Accounts received this week state that the Legislative Council met on the 1st of November. Sir Harry Smith, in his opening address, observed that half the war was caused with the Boer tribe in consequence of the profound ignorance he regretted his Lordship had of the question of emigration to the Cape.

Sir Harry then enumerated the measures which he should adopt. The Kaffirs on the eastern frontier were to be compensated for loss of territory, and [illegible] Bridges were to be restored. Free, wandering, and located. [illegible] to be [illegible] the introduction of the [illegible] agent. A liberal bill is to be introduced to relieve the colonists. Restrictions on holding public meetings [illegible] to be removed, and municipal laws amended. He proposed to raise a supplementary estimate of £72,000. The colony, he said, was only chargeable with £6,000 for putting down the insurgent boers. The Boers had been heavily fined, and had already paid £4,000.

WEST INDIES.

The usual monthly mails have been received during the week.

From Jamaica the accounts are of some importance, arising from the recent [illegible] in that island, which had required to avail itself of the proffered loan of £6,000,000 offered by the mother country for relief of the colony, the borrowing of which was only recommended to the House in the speech of his Excellency Lord [illegible] [illegible] House of Lords, to be subject, adopted on the 8th inst., that "it [illegible] on would be loan is called for by the Imperial Parliament [illegible] for the revolution of the 11 Vict. c. 14th, cause it is unwise to [illegible] the [illegible] capital."

On the same day the [illegible] appointed a committee to take into consideration the best mode of a [illegible] not to [illegible] [illegible] the owners of property [illegible] the abolition of [illegible] and compensation for [illegible] [illegible] by the unfair competition to which [illegible] of estates is [illegible] exposed by the sugar Bounty Act [illegible] [illegible] has just been [illegible] a still more costly [illegible] [illegible] Office, and not content with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] establishment of an island bank for all [illegible] not which most favourable terms the House that [illegible] appointed to consider its practicability [illegible] on the subject.

matters. Was positive that the second prisoner was the same man who came by the up-train and returned by the down-train. The other (Poole) had on the Jim Crow hat, which witness noticed coming out and in, and believed to be the same hat.

Jane Crabb, barmaid at the Talbot Inn, Bath-street, Bristol, recollected the night in question. Two men came to the house that night, from ten to twenty minutes past twelve. They went into the bar, and called for two small glasses of brandy and water, which witness, after showing them into an adjoining room, served them with. The one nearest me I don't know so well; but the second I am positive of being one of the men. He had on a dark coat, something like Chesterfield, or it is hat. The other wore a dark cloak, with a stand-up collar gathered round, old-fashioned, and like the one produced, and with a dark low-crowned hat, no cap, and wide rim that hid his face. His head was rather large, so that the collar and hat completely h d him. The one with the cloak, when they came in, appeared to have something under it, carrying in his hand, like a carpet-bag. They remained until one o'clock, and then came to the door of the room and I opened it. They neither left the room until they went away. They could walk from thence to the station in ten minutes. The one with the cloak and the same hat that he had on going in; and the other appeared to have something in his hand.

The prisoners were remanded to Saturday (this day).

It is suspected that all the property and valuables abstracted from the up-mail is secreted somewhere in Bristol; and a most rigid search is being instituted.

COUNTRY BANK NOTES.—Tradesmen cannot be too much on their guard in taking the notes of provincial banks, of the character of which they are ignorant. Last week a tradesman in Bristol was victimised by a respectable-looking person, who described himself to be a captain of the port of Gloucester. He made a small purchase, and entered into conversation on free port matters with much ease and gentlemanly bearing, ultimately tendering a £10 note of the Gloucester Old Bank, dated Nov. 1842, against which he received £9 14s. in cash. The Gloucester Old Bank stopped payment some thirty years since, and, upon subsequent examination, the date 1842 is evidently a forgery. Strange enough, this very note afterwards passed through several hands without suspicion, nor was its worthlessness discovered until paid into one of the local banks.

REPRESENTATION OF THE CARDIGANSHIRE BOROUGHS.—The death of Pryse P se, Esq., has caused a vacancy in the representation of the Cardigan Boroughs; and, it being understood that it is not the intention of the eldest son, Mr. Pryse, to come forward as a candidate, it is the opinion of gentlemen that there will be a contested election. The late member for Coventry, Mr. W. Williams, is gomoken of as Aberystwith, as a likely man on the Liberal interest. The candidates on the Conservative side are named as being Major Harford, Esq., of Bristol, and W. H. Lewis, Esq., of Clynfiew. The latter is considered to be the most likely person; the former was defeated by Mr. Pryse at the last contested election. Nothing certain is known as yet of the movements of either party, no gentleman having announced his intention of coming forward.

THE STANFIELD-HALL MURDERS.—On Monday, James Blomfield Rush underwent another examination at the Castle of Norwich. Throughout Emily Sandford's presence at the various examinations of the prisoner, he evinced the most bitter and vindictive feelings towards her, as also to the magistrates. On this occasion, however, his conduct was quite the reverse; and although her testimony was quite new to him, and certainly more conclusive as regarded his guilt than he had as yet heard, he omitted all that violent cross-examination and blasphemous expressions which so greatly afflicted his unhappy victim, and created so much indignation amongst the magistrates; indeed, his demeanour in this instance to the poor woman was so calm and mild as was boisterous before. Her examination in chief being closed, he abandoned him putting any questions to her, and she having duly signed her additional deposition, was conveyed back to the Wymondham Bridewell. Rush's behaviour in the gaol exhibits almost the same coolness as he displayed when first accused of being concerned in perpetrating the murders. He is constantly engaged in writing, putting up his own defence, and is frequently visited by his eldest daughter, a fine young woman about 18 or 20 years of age. Mrs. Jermy and the maid, Eliza Chestney, are progressing most favourably. As soon as practicable, it is the intention to remove Mrs. Jermy to London.

EXPERIMENTS WITH THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH.—Some interesting experiments were made on Wednesday, at Folkestone, under the auspices of the South-Eastern Company, to test the practicability of laying down a wire from Folkestone to Boulogne, and thus establishing a complete line of electric communication between Paris and London. The only preventive difficulty to be overcome in establishing such communication, is to procure perfect insulation of the wire, the fact being, as is well known to scientific persons, that the slightest approach of moisture interferes with the conveyance of the fluid. This inconvenience is also felt in the tunnel, where the constant humidity frequently causes interruption of the communication. The company, therefore, in proceeding the present experiments, had a double object in view—that of a complete their inland, as well as to establish a submarine, telegraph. The wires used were those recently patented by Mr. Forster, of Streatham, being ordinary copper wire, but completely encased in a thick composition of gutta percha and sulphur, the former ingredient being considered more impervious to water, and less liable to abrasion from contact with rocks or sand than India rubber, and the latter being a non conductor of electricity, and also an excellent preserver of vegetable matter. The original intention was that one coil and batteries should be taken on board one of the company's vessels, and carried two or three miles out of the harbour, the experiment then to be tried of signalling electrical communication from thence to the metropolis; but the bi terness state of the weather made it necessary that this part of the plan should be abandoned. Under these circumstances, the wire was taken on board the steamer Mary, at her berth, and from thence gradually uncoiled, and carried round the harbour, taking a sinuous course to the extent of two miles, the wire being attached to the London signal post. Three batteries of twenty-five pairs each were then put in action, and the needles being set to work, several questions were sent to London, and the immediate response of appropriate answers indicated that the submarine communication, in so far as the transmission of verbal messages was concerned, was completed. Subsequently it was attempted to ring the electric bell, but this was a comparative failure, attributable, it was supposed, to the wire not being sufficiently insulated, and that some portion of the communication between Folkestone and London had been interrupted by an accidental cause. The main principle, however—the perfect insulation of the wire when under water—was completely established, leaving its extension across Channel merely a question of detail. When we reflect that the distance between Folkestone and Point Grinez (the part of the French coast contemplated) is only 30 miles, and that the depth of water across Channel varies from 14 to 17 fathoms, with a good bottom all the way, it hardly too much to expect that at no distant day the telegraphic communication between London and Paris will be completed. The expense of laying down the wires, according to Mr. Forster's method, is estimated at £3000.

MR. DUFFY'S TRIAL.

The proceedings in this protracted case were resumed on Friday se'nnight, when the Court gave judgment on the demurrer, which the prisoner's counsel had entered to the whole indictment, and in which quarter the Attorney-general had joined issue. The indictment contained six counts—the first four charging several distinct publications of seditious acts, by which the composing in each was alleged to be expressed, and the fifth and sixth charging publication, but more generally, several publications as overt acts.

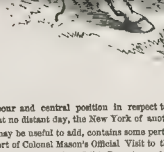
which, from its harbour and central position in respect to the Gold Mines, is destined to become, at no distant day, the New York of another Empire State."

The pamphlet, it may be useful to add, contains some pertinent prefatory observations; the Report of Colonel Mason's Official Visit to the Gold Region, in July last, several letters corroborative of this Report; an interesting picture of the gold-finding; and a variety of information on the soil and agricultural productions of the country.

We now come to the localities we have illustrated, which we find thus cleverly described in the geographical memoir upon Alta-California, addressed by Lieutenant-Colonel Fremont to the Senate, at the last session of Congress:—

BAY OF SAN FRANCISCO, AND DEPENDENT COUNTRY.

The bay of San Francisco has been celebrated, from the time of its first discovery, as one of the finest in the world, and is justly entitled to that character, even under the seaman's view of a mere harbour. But when all the necessary advantages which belong to it—fertile and picturesque dependent country, mildness and salubrity of climate, connexion with the great interior valley of the



LUMP OF GOLD JUST RECEIVED FROM CALIFORNIA.

Sacramento and San Joaquin, its vast resources for ship-timber, grain, and cattle—when these advantages are taken into the account, with its geographical position on the line of communication with Asia, it rises into an importance far above that of a mere harbour, and deserves a particular notice in any account of maritime California. Its latitudinal position is that of Lisbon; its climate is that of southern Italy; settlements upon it for more than half a century attest its healthfulness; bold shores and mountains give it grandeur; the extent and fertility of its dependent country give it great resources for agriculture, commerce, and population.

The bay of San Francisco is separated from the sea by low mountain ranges. Looking from the peaks of the Sierra Nevada, the coast mountains present an apparently continuous line, with only a single gap, resembling a mountain pass. This is the entrance to the great bay, and is the only water communication from the coast to the interior country. Approaching from the sea, the coast presents a bold outline. On the south, the bordering mountains come down in a narrow ridge of broken hills, terminating in a precipitous point, against which the sea breaks heavily. On the northern side, the mountain presents a bold promontory, rising in a few miles to the height of two or three thousand feet. Between these points is the strait, about one mile broad in the narrowest part, and five miles long from the sea to the bay. Passing through this gate, the bay opens to the right and left, extending in each direction about 35 miles, having a total length of more than 70, and a coast of about 276 miles. It is divided by straits and projecting points into three separate bays, of which the northern two are called San Pablo and Suisson bays. Within, the view presented is of a mountainous country, the bay resembling an interior lake of deep water, lying between parallel ranges of mountains. Islands, which have the bold character of the shores, some mere masses of rock, and others grass-covered rising to the height of three and eight hundred feet, break its surface, and add to its picturesque appearance. Directly fronting the entrance, mountains, a few miles from the shore, rise about two thousand feet above the water, crowned by a forest of the lofty cypress, which is visible from the sea, and make a conspicuous landmark for vessels entering the bay. Behind, the rugged peak of Mount Diavolo, nearly 1000 feet high (3770), overlooks the surrounding country of the bay and San Joaquin.

The immediate shore of the bay derives, from its proximate and opposite relation to the sea, the name of Contra Costa (counter coast, or opposite coast). It presents a varied character of rugged and broken hills, rolling and undulating land, and rich alluvial shores, backed by fertile and wooded ranges, suitable for towns, villages, and farms, with which it is beginning to be dotted. A low alluvial bottom land, several miles in breadth, with occasional open woods of oak, borders the foot of the mountains around the southern arm of the bay, terminating on a breadth of twenty miles in the fertile valley of the St. Joseph, a narrow plain of rich soil, lying between ranges from two to three thousand feet high. The valley is openly wooded with groves of oak, free from underbrush, and after the spring rains covered with grass. Taken in connexion with the valley of San Juan, with which it forms a continuous plain, it is fifty-five miles long, and ten to twenty broad, opening into smaller valleys among the hills. At the head of the bay it is twenty miles broad, and about the same at the southern end, where the soil is beautifully fertile, covered in summer with four or five varieties of wild clover several feet high. In many places it is overgrown with wild mustard, growing ten or twelve feet high, in almost impenetrable fields, through which roads are made like lanes. On both sides the mountains are fertile, wooded, or covered with grasses and scattered trees. On the west it is protected from the chilling influence of the north-west winds by the Cuesta de los Gatos (wild-cat ridge), which separates it from the coast. This is a grassy and timbered mountain, watered with small streams, and wooded on both sides with many varieties of trees and shrubbery, the heavier forests of pine and cypress occupying the western slope. Timber and shingles are now obtained from this mountain, and one of the recently discovered quicksilver mines is on the eastern side of the mountain, near the Pueblo of San José. This range terminates on the south in the Anno Nuevo point of Monterey, by and on the north declines into a ridge of broken hills, about five miles wide, between the bay and the sea, and having the town of San Francisco on the bay shore, near its northern extremity.

Sheltered from the cold winds and fogs of the sea, and having a soil of remarkable fertility, the valley of St. Joseph (San José) is capable of producing in great perfection many fruits and grain which do not thrive on the coast in its immediate vicinity. Without taking into consideration the extraordinary yields which have sometimes occurred, the fair average product of wheat is estimated at fifty-fold, or fifty for one sown. The mission establishments of Santa Clara and San José, in the north end of the valley, were formerly, in the prosperous days of the mission, distinguished for the superiority of their wheat crops.

The slope of the alluvial land continues entirely around the eastern shore of the bay, intersected by small streams, and offering some points which good landing and deep water, with advantageous positions between the sea and interior country, indicate for future settlement.

The Strait of Carquines, about one mile wide and eight or ten fathoms deep, connects the San Pablo and Suisson bays. Around these bays smaller valleys open into the bordering country, and some of the streams have a short launch navigation, which serves to convey produce to the bay. Missions and large farms were established at the head of navigation on these streams, which are favourable sites for towns or villages. The country around the Suisson bay presents smooth low ridges and rounded hills, clothed with wild oats, and more or less openly wooded on their summits. Approaching its northern shores from Sonoma, it assumes, though in a state of nature, a cultivated and beautiful appearance. Wild oats cover it in continuous fields, and herds of cattle and bands of horses are scattered over low hills and partly isolated ridges, where blue mists and openings among the abruptly terminating hills indicate the neighbourhood of the bay.

The Suisson is connected with an expansion of the river formed by the junction of the Sacramento and San Joaquin, which enter the Francisco bay in the same latitude nearly as the mouth of the Tagus at Lisbon. A delta of twenty-five miles in length, divided into islands by deep channels, connects the bay with the valley of the San Joaquin and Sacramento, into the mouths of which the tide flows, and which enter the bay together as one river.

Such is the bay, and the proximate country and shores of the bay, of San Francisco. It is not a mere indentation of the coast, but a little sea to itself, connected with the ocean by a defensible gate, opening out between 70 and 80 miles to the right and left, upon a breadth of 10 to 15, deep enough for the largest ships, with bold shores suitable for towns and settlements, and fertile adjacent country for cultivation. The head of the bay is about 40 miles from the sea, and there commences its connexion with the noble vallies of the San Joaquin and Sacramento.

The View of the Town and Bay of San Francisco, upon the front page of our present Number, is from a Sketch brought home by an officer of her Majesty's ship Modeste, lately returned from the Pacific station, and obligingly placed at our disposal by a Correspondent, who remarks: "San Francisco bids fair to become, at no distant period, the New York of the West. The bay is one of the finest in the world; certainly, the safest, and most capacious between Cape Horn and the Straits of St. Juan de Fuca: while, like the harbour of Rio de Janeiro, its entrance could readily be made impregnable."

The Second View shows the mountainous scenery in the neighbourhood of San Francisco, and with it the celebrated feat of throwing the lasso. This has been copied from one of the Illustrations of Captain Beechy's "Narrative of a Voyage to the Pacific," &c.

SPECIMEN OF THE GOLD.

We have been favoured, by the gentleman to whom we are indebted for the loan of Foster's pamphlet, with the sight of a lump of gold, of the weight of four English sovereigns. We give its exact outline.

SACRAMENTO INDIAN.

This portrait sketch has been copied from one of the illustrations of "Wilkes's Exploring Expedition." The Indians dwelling on the banks of the Sacramento are represented by Wilkes as friendly and docile, and their faces are said to be marked with an expression of good-humour. Most of them go naked, others wear a piece of deerskin thrown over their shoulders. Some wear their hair long, extending below the neck, and divided from the top; but it is most commonly worn drawn back, and gathered in a bunch behind, where it is fastened with a string of deer-sinew, and the top ornamented with coloured feathers. They paint their faces, especially the forehead and the cheek (the latter in the form of a triangle), with a blue-black colour, mixed with some shining particles resembling pulverised mica.

We conclude with a list (from Foster's pamphlet) of ROUTES TO CALIFORNIA.

	Dollars
From New York to San Francisco (by steam, round the Capes)	380
From New York to Chagres (by steam)	150
From Chagres to Panama, across the Isthmus	20
From Panama to San Francisco	200
From New York to Chagres (by sailing vessel)	80

"The time of the voyage is as follows:—

From New York to Chagres	12 to 15 days
From Chagres to Panama	2 "
From Panama to San Francisco	20 "
From New York to San Francisco (round the Capes) ..	130 "

"San Francisco is on the sea-coast, twenty miles from Sutter's Fort, where the lower mines is situated, and about forty miles from the upper one. Gold, however, has been found plentifully on all the streams in the region indicated in our map, and even far higher up the valley of the Sacramento is supposed to exist in large quantities.

"A specimen of the Californian gold has been assayed by the United States Mint in Philadelphia, and has been officially declared to be considerably purer than the gold of the American coinage, requiring about 5 per cent. alloy to fit it for being converted into legal currency.

"In addition to the above route, via Chagres, are two others, which it will be proper to indicate. The first of these is from New York to Vera Cruz, and across Mexico (five days by the Diligencia) to Acapulco, on the Pacific. Here all the northward-bound vessels touch; and the route, were it not for the danger (or rather certainty) of being robbed on the road from Vera Cruz to Acapulco, would be preferable to any other

"The other route to the Gold Mines is the overland route, by way of Independence and Santa Fé: From Independence you follow the regular waggon and caravan track to Santa Fé; thence, in order to avoid the vast desert of the Rocky Mountains, you make a long détour to the south, and strike the Pacific at San Diego, and thence work upwards to San Francisco and the Mines. This route requires about five months."

THE QUEEN'S TWELFTH CAKE.

HER MAJESTY'S TWELFTH CAKE.

WE give a representation of the Twelfth Cake prepared for her Majesty, which graced the Royal table at Windsor Castle on Saturday last (Twelfth Night).

This superb Cake was designed and carried out by her Majesty's confectioner, Mr. Mawdlit. The Cake was of regal dimensions, being about 30 inches in diameter, and tall in proportion: round the side the decorations consisted of strips of gilded paper, bowing outwards near the top, issuing from an elegant gold bordering. The figures, of which there were sixteen, on the top of the Cake, represented a party of beaux and belles of the last century enjoying a repast al fresco, under some trees; whilst others, and some children, were dancing to minstrel strains.

The repast, spread on the ground, with its full complement of comestibles, decanters, and wine-glasses (the latter, by the way, not sugar glasses, but real brittle ware), was admirably modelled, as were also the figures, servants being represented handing refreshments to some of the gentlemen and ladies, whilst some of the companions of the latter were dancing. The violinist and harpist seemed to be thoroughly impressed with the importance of their functions, and their characteristic attitudes were cleverly given. As a specimen of fancy workmanship, the ornaments to the cake do credit to the skill of Mr. Mawdlit, the Royal confectioner.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Albert and the younger branches of the Royal Family, walked early in the morning in the Home Park. Her Majesty and the Prince, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household, attended divine service in the private chapel at the Castle. The service was performed by the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, who also administered the holy communion.

On Wednesday Prince Albert went out shooting in the course of the morning. Prince Lowenstein and the Earl and Countess of Fortescue arrived at the Castle in the evening, on a visit to her Majesty and the Prince. The Royal dinner party included the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Amelie of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, the Princess Elise of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, Prince Lowenstein, the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas, Lady Fanny Howard, the Earl and Countess Fortescue, the Earl of Carlisle, Lord James Murray, and the Rt. Each widow will also be entitled (on a certificate signed by a beneficed clergyman that they are of sober life and conversation, and members of the Church of England) to an annuity of £30, payable half-yearly at Messrs. Coutts's.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Parma left London on Monday to spend a few days at the Earl of Chesterfield's, at Bretby Park. On the return of his Royal Highness, the Prince and Princess will pay a visit to the Queen Dowager, at Sunmore Priory. METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

THE NEW COMMISSION OF METROPOLITAN SEWERS.

[illegible]'s Commission for carrying into effect the New Metropolitan Sewers Act opened on Wednesday, at the Sewers Office, Greek-street, Soho-square. Among the Commissioners present were the Earl of Carlisle, who presided; Lord Ebrington, M.P.; the Very Rev. Dr. Buckland, Dean of Westminster; Dr. [illegible] consequence of local and technical hindrances, the Commission had not been opened long ago, and all they could now do was to strive to make up for that time which had been irrecoverably lost. (Hear, hear.) They were not commencing their labours at [illegible]

though as yet the metropolis had not been heavily visited by the cholera, they could not be sure that its energies were not pent up by the strong hand of winter, and that when loosened by the spring it would not come amongst them with tenfold power. (Hear, hear.) They might learn a great deal by what had recently happened at Tooting, and should take care that the worthiness and usefulness of its enterprise were carefully examined. They were aware that Government had constituted a general Board of Health, and, considering the character of that board, he thought it highly desirable that at least one officer should be connected with both bodies, for the business of the present Court would be conducted by committees and sub-committees. Perhaps he might be allowed to state, that the extent and variety of attainments and reputation in the [illegible] the commission rendered it desirable that there should be, on some points, a discrepancy of views and a conflict of opinions. Let him be allowed to express his earnest wish that all would work in the spirit of modesty, candour, and forbearance towards one another, and care for nothing but the truth. He should also recommend them to combine with a strict attention to the [illegible]

[illegible] fixed.

On the motion of Mr. Bailey, the rates made by the late commissions were received by this court.

On the motion of Lord Ebrington, it was agreed that the ordinary courts should be held on the first Thursday in every month.

It was ordered that a book should be kept at the office, to receive any complaints that might be made regarding the sewage of the metropolis. Some conversation on the subject then ensued, and it was resolved that the book should be open to any one.

Mr. Hume hoped that persons making complaints would be informed whether or not they were attended to, and what steps were taken to remedy the evil, as they were it would prevent the members of the commission individually from being applied to to know what had been done.

Mr. Hartnell said, that recently any one making a complaint had subsequently been informed of what was done in reference to it, and that practice would continue.

The Court then adjourned

ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.—The usual half-yearly meeting of this society took place on Tuesday, at the office, Trafalgar-square; Mr. B. B. Cabbell in the chair. The secretary gave a summary of the cases in which the efforts of the society had been instrumental in the saving of human life during the past season: 196 persons had been taken from the water by the Society's assistants, of which number 185 had been [illegible] by the exertions [illegible] awards: A gold medal, to Capt. Mu.man, 4th Foot, for his gallant exertions by which several lives had been preserved during the progress of the Great Exhibition; Mr. W. Lucy, John Heslop, and John Grange, seamen aboard H.M.S. Acorn; Mr. M'Cann, surgeon, for his exertions in restoring persons supposed to be drowned to animation; S. Sims, master of Watermen's Arms, Gravesend; Eugene Blaquiere, R.M.S. Ferret; J. Robinson, seaman, H.M.S. Sea Lark; J. Field, H.M.S. President; and Mr. J. Smith. The above persons having on various occasions during the year been instrumental in the saving of human life. Awards of £1 each to the men of the Society employed during the late frost in the parks completed to-day, they having been instrumental in saving thirty one persons on the 4th, 6th, and 7th of the present month. The amount of subscriptions received during the year was £1830 10s. 3d., and the expenditure £1822 18s., leaving a balance in favour of the Society of £7 11s. 3d. All the officers of the past year were re-elected, except the vice-president, who resigned in favour of Mr. Thomas Haines.

THE NEW CITY PRISON.—On Monday a meeting took place at the [illegible] in Aldersgate-street, for the purpose of [illegible] the inhabitants present, which was accounted for by some members of the ward upon the ground that no general notice had been given, and by others that the ward placed so much reliance upon the representatives of the citizens of London in the Court of Common Council, as to render any [illegible] pretty fully, a resolution, inviting the representatives to advocate the postponement of the erection of the new prison until the question should undergo further consideration, was agreed to by a small majority.

OPENING OF ISLINGTON MARKET.

The business of this market was commenced on Tuesday. The number of cattle, sheep, and pigs—to which description of stock the market was limited—fell short of what the proprietors and promoters had reason to expect: but it was considered, however, from the readiness with which sales were effected, the presence of a large number of respectable buyers and graziers, and the fact of so many attest personally their desire to support the undertaking, that its ultimate, if not immediate, success, was pretty certain. The locality and space it occupies, the several easy and spacious ways of access to it, and the advantages it secures not only to the seller, but to the consumer, lead to the indulgence of sanguine hopes that its opening, particularly at the present moment, when sanatory measures are so much looked for, will end in the fulfilment of one of the avowed objects of its supporters "the removal of Smithfield market"—and will entitle it to the name assumed in the prospectus of "The London Cattle Market."

As the business of the day was drawing to a close, the buyers were invited to partake of a cold collation in the board-room, where they assembled in successive groups of 30 and 30.

THE NEW ARRANGEMENTS OF THE CONSOLIDATED EXCISE AND STAMPS AND TAXES DEPARTMENTS.—It is stated that the appointment of Mr. [illegible] (late Board of Excise) as one of the commissioners under the united board, will be only of a temporary duration, viz. until July next, when the hon. deputy chairman will have completed a service of 25 years, and will then be entitled to the highest retiring allowance. Admiral the Hon. W. H. Percy also retires on the superannuation allowance, added to his pay of retired admiral; and Mr. Charles Ross, the junior commissioner, has been appointed one of the commissioners for carrying into effect the Act for the Improvement of the Health of Towns. Several other changes are spoken of, and it appears still to be an unsettled question whether Somerset House or the present Excise offices will be selected as the head locality, for the joint department.

THE OFFICE OF PRINCIPAL HARBOUR-MASTER OF THE PORT OF LONDON has become vacant by the resignation of Captain Fisher, R.N., who has held the important post for thirty years. The appointment of his successor is vested in the Lord Mayor.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—Some doubts appearing to exist whether inland postage is to be taken in the United Kingdom upon letters addressed to be conveyed between the United Kingdom and foreign countries, by the contract packets belonging to the United States Government, it should be understood that no postage whatever is to be taken in this country upon the letters in question, as the postage due for their conveyance is to be collected in the United States. Letters forwarded to the United States by the British contract mail packets, or by any private ship, are liable to the same rates as heretofore.

SALE OF THE STOWE LIBRARY.—The sale of the Duke of Buckingham's library, removed from Stowe, was commenced on Monday, at Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson's rooms, in Wellington-street. There was a very large attendance of purchasers, including all the eminent booksellers in London, either in person or by their representatives. Sir George Warrender and several private collectors were also present. There is little in the character of the [illegible] books from various libraries, which in course of generations have descended to the Buckingham family. There is, in consequence, an absence of that complete[illegible] the presentation copies of rare works are exceedingly numerous. The prices fetched were pretty good.

From information George received, he proceeded with three police-constables, all well armed with pistols and cutlasses, to the houses No. 22, Catherine-street, Limehouse-fields. Two of the constables were placed in front of the house, while George and the other constable [illegible] the adjoining premises, and proceeded to the [illegible] tradesman illicit distillation. There was also found on the same room 200 gallons of wash, in a state of fermentation, and several bladders which had contained illicit spirits. A man and two females were the only persons found in the house: [illegible] only lodgers in the house. They were quite ignorant of the still being in the kitchen. George seized the still, spirits, and all the utensils, and conveyed them to Bow-street.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT.—About nine o'clock on Monday evening, as two gentlemen were proceeding in a gig down Ludgate-hill, the horse, having taken fright, dashed off at a fearful pace, the driver losing all command over the animal, which dashed along, crossing Farringdon-street and up Fleet-street, till, on arriving exactly opposite the Punch office, the vehicle came in contact with a [illegible] cart, when the violence of the concussion threw both gentlemen from their seats. One alighted head foremost against the kerb-stone, where he was found to all appearance quite dead. He was directly removed to Mr. Hutchinson's surgery in Farringdon-street, where five injuries were declared to be of too serious a character for temporary assistance, and, by the orders of that gentleman's assistant he was at once conveyed on a stretcher by the police to St. [illegible] Hospital, in a state of [illegible] fortunate man presenting all the appearance of [illegible] been broken in. In St. James's-park the ice was very dangerous, and notwithstanding the cautions issued numbers crowded on: the consequence was that the ice gave way, and 13 persons were immersed. They were, however, rescued and restored by means of the Society men, and the remedies at hand in their tent. On the Serpentine also the ice was very dangerous, the only practicable part being near the fountain. The firemen were on duty, and rescued several persons. In Kensington-gardens, on the Round Pond and Long Water, the ice was tolerably firm, and there was a large assemblage of skaters, including the members of the Skating Club, who had their tent erected on the north bank. Here no casualty occurred. In the Regent's park, where also large numbers assembled, between 16 and 20 persons were in the water at one time.

TWO DESTRUCTIVE FIRES IN BETHNAL-GREEN.—On Saturday last two serious fires broke out in the parish of Bethnal-green, which were both attended with a considerable destruction of property. The first occurred upon the premises of Mr Charles Long, a cabinet-maker, No. 112, Church-street. The flames originated in the workshops at the rear of the dwelling-house. In spite of the most strenuous exertions of the firemen, Mr. Long's workshops were totally destroyed, the back window sashes of the dwelling burned out, and the furniture extensively damaged by fire. The other, No. 111, in the same street, belonging to Mr. Robert Chesmore, corn-chandler, and No. 113, in the tenure of Mr. Joseph Newport, are also materially damaged by fire, water, and the hasty removal of furniture. How the fire commenced is unknown. The second [illegible]

CHOLERA AMONG THE PAUPER CHILDREN AT TOOTING.—Since last week, the greater portion of the children have been removed to their respective unions; but we regret to have to state that the epidemic has manifested itself amongst them at the various places to which they have been removed. The total number of cases since the commencement at Tooting was, up to Thursday, 294; deaths, 118; convalescent, 34.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS, &c.—The deaths registered in London during the week ending Saturday last numbered 1131, or 31 under the average. Sixty-one deaths are returned as arising from cholera, 81 from scarlatina, and 56 from typhus. The births during the week were 1312.

THE "BRITANNIA" TUBULAR RAILWAY BRIDGE.

COLOSSAL LIONS FOR THE PEDESTAL OF THE BRIDGE.

HIS magnificent structure, which is now rapidly advancing towards completion, S, as our readers are generally aware, intended to carry the Chester and Holyhead Railway across the Menai Straits. Like the beautiful Bridge at Conway, it is on the tubular principle, but on a much grander scale, and is also designed and erected under the superintendence of Robert Stephenson, Esq.: when completed, will be at once the most ingenious, daring, and stupendous monument of engineering skill which modern times have seen attempted.

In our large representation, we give a general view of the Bridge in its present state of progress, taken from the base of the Anglesey Abutment, and showing the immense masses of building, and the scaffolding between the abutment an the pier. The whole of the masonry (except the backing up inside, which is Rancorn stone) is of Anglesey limestone, in such immense blocks, that, to the eye of the uninitiated, it seems almost impossible to move them; yet they are moved with perfect ease; for such is the ingenuity, simplicity, and strength of the tackle used, that it amounts to no matter of small moment whether a block of stone weighs one ton or twelve tons.

The pile of masonry seen on the extreme left, in the large Engraving, is on the Anglesey side of the Straits, and is called the Anglesey Abutment. The masonry of this is completed, and the scaffolding removed: it is 143 feet 6 inches high, and, from the front to the end of the wing walls, is 173 feet. These wing walls resemble in pedestals, on which repose two colossal lions of Egyptian character, and to which we shall refer presently. The space between the Anglesey Abutment and the Anglesey Pier (viz. 250 feet) is now being filled up by an immense scaffolding, 96 feet in height, of the same description, in its multifarious uprights, stays, braces, and sills, 70,000 cubic feet of timber having been made use of. This mode of construction is remarkably ingenious, and exhibits great strength.

It is intended to connect the pair of tubes which form the first grand link in the connecting chain between the Anglesey and Carnarvon shores on this scaffolding, which will of course be removed as soon as the tubes are completed.

The second pile of masonry adjoining this scaffold is the Anglesey Pier. This pier is at present about 197 feet high; the level of the bottom of the tubes being 124 feet above low water. The dimensions of the pier are 80 feet wide, by 352 feet long. The total height, when completed, will be 195 feet.

In the middle of the Menai Straits stands the Britannia Rock (from which the tubes receive their name), and on this rock the Britannia Pier is erected. This

Is not quite so far advanced as the other work, but is nevertheless in a forward state, being now built to the height of 131 feet above low-water mark, or 7 feet above the bottom of the tubes. The bulk of the masonry is 148 feet long by 46 feet by 46 feet, and the total height when completed will be 240 feet. It is equally distant from the Anglesey and Carnarvon Piers, being 460 feet in the clear from each, and will sustain the four ends of the four long tubes which span the distance from shore to shore.

The Carnarvon Pier is next in succession, the masonry of which is nearly completed. It is the same in every respect as the Anglesey Pier.

The Carnarvon Abutment is also of a similar character to the one on the Anglesey shore; but the ground at the place being much higher, the masonry is not of that immense altitude which makes the Anglesey Abutment so conspicuous an object. The span between the Carnarvon Abutment and Pier is 230 feet, and is intended to be completed by two tubes, which will be supported by temporary timber scaffolding now in course of erection, of precisely similar characters to that shown in our Engraving, on the Anglesey side

The contract for the masonry has been undertaken by Messrs. J. Nowell and Co., who have also executed the immense timber scaffolding, platforms, &c. required for building the tubes upon, and which of the massive form a considerable portion of the architectural characteristics of the work have been designed by Mr Francis Thomason, of Peckham, the resident engineer of the work being Mr. Frank Forster.

It will be gathered from the foregoing description, that the two pairs of short tubes, which are 230 feet long, including their hold upon the masonry, and which span the spaces between the Anglesey Abutment and Pier and between the Carnarvon Abutment and Pier, are intended to be built on scaffolding at the proper height, and in the exact position which they will be required to occupy when completed, the scaffolding being then removed from under them. The two pairs of long tubes, however, which fill up the spaces between the Anglesey Pier and Britannia Pier, and Britannia Pier and Carnarvon Pier, and which are each 470 feet long, including their hold upon the stone-work, and which are in a very forward state, are being built on platforms erected along the Carnarvon shore; and a view of the busy scene on the platforms we place before our readers, showing the men at work upon the tubes, &c.

We shall not here enter into their constructive details, as the tubes are perfectly similar to the one at Conway, a minute account of which will be found in our Number for the 11th of March last, the only variation being that these tubes are 88 feet longer and three feet higher, and, consequently, in so much greater the arrangements for floating and raising are also similar.

The four colossal lions which adorn the pedestals at either end of the Bridge are as we have before observed, of Egyptian character, and are truly admirable in design and workmanship. They are each 25 feet 6 inches in length, and 12 feet 6 inches in height, by 8 feet in width, and are 87 tons in weight. Two thousand cubic feet of stone were required for each lion, and from these statistics some idea may be formed of the prodigious scale on which even the decorative part of the bridge is carried out. The lions were modelled by Mr. J. E. Thomas, and prove the versatility of his genius, inasmuch as these specimens in bronze, so fine as any of the numerous works by him we have had occasion to notice, in our representation we show the lions in the workshop, one of them being in an unfinished state; and space left at the end of the shed for Leo Colossus to enter, and behold what our sketch we take

It is not to be understood to mention here that the original intention was to have crowned the masonry of the Britannia Pier with a colossal seated figure of Science. This figure was to have been 50 feet in height, on a base of 30 by 26, and seventeen thousand feet of stone would have been required for it. Unfortunately, however, the degree dearth of the railway interests in the country caused this railroad to relinquish this truly grand design; but we must hope the idea is only postponed, not finally abandoned, and that Mr. Thomas will yet be called on to add this feature

The contractors for the tubes are Messrs. Mare and Co., of Blackwall, London, and Messrs. W. J. and J. Garforth, of Dukenfield, near Ashton-under-Lyne; the whole being under the immediate superintendence of Mr. Edwin Clark, who, under the direction of Robert Stephenson, Esq., so successfully built and placed the Conway tube in its present position, and which so fully meets the expectations of all its most sanguine supporters, at the same time putting to flight the groundless apprehensions of many

It is impossible to conceive anything so wonderful as the works of these huge piles of iron. Tramways are laid on the platform, along which, mounted upon with bar and sheet-iron, of different fashions, are constantly being urged to the points where they are required. Steam engines are continually at work, pouring their dense smoke into the air from the tall chimneys, while machinery worked by them, the whirr of the many wheels moved by them, and the Lord's-King of the hammers of the blacksmiths at work upon the rose-bolts along the tubes, caused by the riveters closing the seams of the iron work, produces such an union of discordant noises, that to imagine its equal is impossible, as for as sound is concerned. Here it possibly forms a fitting type of the multifarious engines, of unique design and requirements, which occur at almost every step, and all perform unexampled operations with the most scrupulous exactitude. Nor are the workmen less striking and peculiar than the machines and implements they guide and wield. Strong and sinewy, and thoroughly armed with smoke and dirt, more fitting representatives of Cyclops could not easily be found; and the ease with which the most unwieldy instruments are heaved by them attest their prodigious strength. The procession displayed by the boys employed in hurling the rivets to the riveters engaged in fastening the seams is truly wonderful. Taking a bolt, red-hot, in a pair of pincers, with a jerk they land the bolt to the exact spot where the riveter stands; and, whether the latter is on a platform working at the sides of the tube, or on the top of it, the bolt falls close to his side with the most unerring precision

We close our description with a brief summary of the leading statistics.

The total quantity of stone contained in the ridge when completed will be 1,400,000 cubic feet; the timber used in the various scaffoldings for the masonry, platforms for the erection of the tubes, &c., is 450,000 cubic feet; the weight of malleable iron in the tubes is 10,000 tons; the total length of the whole length of the entire bridge, measuring from the extreme point of the wing walls of the Anglesey Abutment to the extreme of the Carnarvon Abutment, is 1833 feet; its greatest elevation, say at the Britannia Pier, being 240 feet above low-water mark

In order to carry out this vast work, 80 houses have been erected for the accommodation of the workmen, and which, being entirely detached cases and not particularly remarkable for picturesque appearance: amongst them are seen butchers', grocers', and tobacconists' shops, supplying the wants of a numerous population. A day-school, Sunday-school, and meeting-house complete the establishment. Workshops, steam-engines, storehouses, offices, and other buildings meet the eye at every turn; one is led to conclude that a considerable time has elapsed since the works were commenced, yet it is little more than two years ago. A stranger on coming on to the ground is struck with wonder, when for the first time he obtains a general view of these vast piles of masonry towering majestically above all surrounding objects; strange as the pile of timber, which will be soon destroyed, and apparently as endurable, his eye wanders instinctively to the ponderous tubes—those masterpieces of engineering constructiveness and mathematical adjustment: he shrinks into himself as he gazes, and is astonished when he thinks that the whole is but the developed idea of one man, and carried out, in the face of difficulties which few would have dared to encounter.

THE BEST MEANS OF PRECAUTION AGAINST CHOLERA One Roman sentence embodies nearly all that is useful for the prevention of pestilence. "Cold, excessive heat, watching, long fasting, exhaustion, debauch, vomiting, purging, are all bad; increased repose of mind and body, that is quiet, moral and physical tranquillity, are good for all persons; for cheerfulness (to form its secretions, promote digestion, and increase the vitality of the blood: exercise of protracted moderate nature the various poisons the blood, as show, by the state of the breath, and such diminution of vitality lessens man's power to antagonise epidemic influences. MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Handel's oratorio, "Judas Maccabæus," was performed on Monday night. Costa conducting the work for the first time. Exeter Hall was crowded to excess, as much was anticipated after the improved interpretations of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Haydn's "Messiah." The audience at the last execution were not disappointed. Never had this great work the most dramatic in character of all the sacred compositions—been rendered so effectively: it was, in fact, a new work to the public. The grandeur of the warrior-Judas is contrasted with the pious zeal and resignation of Simon, his brother; and superb solo pieces depict the domestic feelings of the Israelites.

The principal singers were Miss Birch, Miss A Williams, Miss M Wilkinson, Mr Reeves, Mr T Williams, and Mr. Phillips. Mr. Reeves was so hoarse in the first part that an apology was made to excuse his singing in the second. The miserable was, therefore, without its Judas on the occasion; and the quintette of the second part, Mr. T. Williams, do not, sadly his singing at present in Exeter Hall. Mr. Phillips gave the music of Simon impressively. The other solos were sung by Miss Birch, Miss A Williams, and Mr. Phillips. The choruses were delivered in the magnificent style of which the numerous choirs were capable. The power and brilliancy of her voice, a marked improvement in her intonation, and a surprising precision in her execution, rendered her vocalisation in the song, "From mighty Kings," truly delightful; and the manner in which she gave the air "Father of Heaven" secured to Catalani and Mrs Billington in executive display in this air. Miss Birch also sang the charming song, "So shall the lute," with exquisite taste and feeling. Miss A. Williams's interpretation of Handel's "Wise men flattering," was efficient and finished; and the incidental air, duo, "O lovely peace," between her, and her sister Miss Martha, the contralto, commanded an irresistible encore, so perfect was the execution.

For the admirable execution of the overture and accompaniments (the same in the former was attacked with amazing point and spirit), and for the grandeur and precision with which the numerous choruses were delivered, no eulogy can be too strong. "Mourn, ye afflicted children," "For O no immortals!" "Disdain'd, slighted," "Thus your harps," "We never will bow down," "Shout unto God," with all splendidly done; but the triumphal "See, the conquering hero comes," quite electrified the auditory, so soul-stirring was the effect. The performance was conducted with much spirit by Costa, and by the Conductor's mind the mingled voices and instruments reached a climax of overwhelming force. There is unusual difficulty in many of the choruses; but the intelligence of the singers mastered them, and, with the influence of the mastermind wielding the baton, the unity and impulse were unerring

The patriarch Lindley obtained his usual burst of applause by his long-drawn violoncello cadence, in the accompaniment to the air, "O Lord!"

The oratorio is to be repeated on the 19th instant

MOLLE LIND.—The concert given at Liverpool, on Saturday morning, at the Amphitheatre, in aid of the funds of the Southern and Toxteth Hospital, was brilliantly attended; and it is stated that £1200 will be realised. Mdlle. Lind, who gave her gratuitous services, sang seven times, and encored three, ending with a verse of the National Anthem. The band of the 46th Regiment played overtures. Mdme. de Lozano, Signori Belletti, and Labitzky also assisted the arrangements. Mr. F. W. Hall was the leader of the theatre gratuitously, and the prices were one guinea, half-a-guinea, and five shillings. In the evening the President and Committee of the Hospital presented at the Theatre Royal a complimentary benefit to Mdlle. Lind, which took the next town in which Mdlle Lind will sing prior to Balfe's concert on the 6th, at Exeter Hall. In February Mdlle. Lind will sing at Worcester and Norwich, for the Musical Festivals.

MUSICAL LECTURES.—On Monday night, Sir H. R. Bishop gave his first Lecture on the Secular Vocal Music of the 17th and 18th Centuries, at the Marylebone Literary Institution. The songs, glees, madrigals, &c. were illustrated by Miss Rasano, Miss Messent, Mr. A. Novello, and Mr Herbert. On Thursday Sir H. R. Bishop, at the Crosby Hall Literary and Scientific Institution, delivered a lecture on "Music and Musical Composers."

BUNN v. LIND.—This action, in which Mr. Bunn recovered a verdict with £2500 damages against Mdlle Jenny Lind, on whose behalf a writ of error was moved, has just been settled, the plaintiff receiving £2000 instead of £2500 (Mdlle Lind's original offer) in settlement of his debt and costs. The cause had been pending since March, 1847.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—We understand that the French Opera season will commence, at the St. James's Theatre, with Paer's "Maître de Chapelle" and Auber's "Domino Noir." Mdlle. Charton, Mdlle Gaichard, M. Beaucé, and M Coudere will appear in the former piece, which will be followed by the "Ambassadrice" at the Music Hall, Store-street.—On Thursday next will be celebrated the 103th anniversary of the Madrigal Society; Lord Saltoun in the chair.—Since the 9th of February, at the Hanover Square Rooms, and at the meetings of the Philodicts' Club, at which Thalberg and Vivier will be present.—The second performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," by the London Harmonic Society (formed), was on Tuesday last, at Exeter Hall. The principal singers were Mesdames Vulcan" and " Beauties, have you seen a toy?" and secretary of the Gentlemen, injured deceased.—Owing to the detention of Lablache in Paris, his place in the "Seal Song" was filled by Mr. Lawler.—Mr. Mellon's Musical Union, on Tuesday, by Herr Schonhoff, a singer who is known as Herr Haas in Germany, and whose debut in England at the eighth London Wednesday Concert.—Mr. Casolina, the celebrated violinist, has been lately in London for his health, but is expected to return to London for the season.—The Western Madrigal Society held their meeting last week at the Mdme Anne Romer's second Soirée Musicale was given on Thursday in Berner's-street.

MUSICAL DATES.—Amateurs and professors will be aided in making their engagements, by remarking the following dates of various meetings for the season:—Philharmonic Society—Mondays, March 12 and 26, April 16 and 30, May 14 and 28, June 11 and 25. Ancient Concerts—Mondays, April 23, May 7 and 21, June 4th and 18th and July 2. Wednesday, June 20. The rehearsals will be on the preceding Saturday mornings, except for the concert on the 20th of June, when it will take place on Monday morning, the 18th. The rehearsal and performance of the "Messiah" on Friday, April 6th. Sacred Harmonic—On the 25th for the former, and 27th the latter. The Choral Harmonists will meet on the 15th of January, February 5th, March 5th, April 9th, and May 7th. Mr. Case's Society Meetings will take place on the 13th (this evening). MUSIC ON THE CONTINENT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday Night

The review of the year 1848 in matters of art is dismal enough. The Revolution, under the new directors, up to the Revolution, had three months of glorious success, but since the days of February there has been nothing but ruin! In addition to the loss of money from the theatres, actors and actresses have had salaries cut down throughout the establishment; but the management is still in most serious state of embarrassment, and it is doubtful whether MM. Duponcheil and Séveste will be able to continue their duties for the remainder of the season. The opera of the "Prophète," on which the hopes of the Théâtre de la Nation now depend. The new works given in 1848 were "Griseldis, ou les Cinq Sens," "Naïda, ou la Nymphe de la Fontaine," "Les Premières Armes de Richelieu," in two acts, by Benoist; "Eden," a mystery, by Felicien David; and "Jeanne la Folle," a five-act opera, by Capfigeon three operas

The Opéra National, rival to the Académie Royale, ceased to exist in the first days of the Republic. The Opéra Comique, with a change in the managerial dynasty, and its firmness revived by Halévy's "Val d'Andorre." The novelties produced in 1848, in addition to this popular work, were "Nuit au Noel," Grisar's "Gilb Ravisseur," Leprevost's "Revoir evéillé," Potier's "Signor Pacardo;" and Poisot's "Ma Bonne."

As regards the Italian Opera, Vatel returned from the direction, leaving it in the hands of M. Bagioli, the brother-in-law of Scribe. He kept the theatre open for about two months, and then was compelled to shut the doors. After long negotiations, Signor Ronconi, of the London Royal Italian Opera, has been granted the privilege, for the remaining three months of this year, up to the end of March, and for 1849. He has engaged about to re-open on occasion "Otello" with Lablache, Madame Castellan, Madame Ronconi, Middle Basto, Signor Bordas, Signor Soldi, Signor Morelli, and Signor Arnaldi, compose the troupe

Mdlle. Jan, in 1846, removed Lumley's Theatre in Mdme. Ullmann. Habeneck has finally retired from his glorious career at the Conservatoire on certain reasons remarking, that a very pretty opera, entitled "Le Cadi," has just been produced at the Opéra Comique, the music by M Ambroise Thomas. We are looking anxiously for Meyerbeer's "Prophète," an important question has been made in the engagement of Mdme. Castellan to fill one of the principal parts. The cast will now include Mdme Viardot, Castellan, M. Roger, M Levasseur, M Brémond &c Mdme Castellan

Berlin to last week. Mr. Balfe Maisel, a tenor, formerly of Lumley's Opera Comique who has lately been at the Milan Scala, is also engaged at the Théâtre de la Nation. Such is the future condition of musical art in Germany, that the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, after having been in existence to make of half-a-century, is to cease to appear. Local causes to be the contrary of death. Calcutta Grisi and Lucca Grisi are dead.

Manchester, was thrown open to foot-passengers, without the payment of any toll.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

The announcement of the first appearance of so popular an actor as Mr. Wilkie, after his late severe indisposition, which it was at one time feared, would incapacitate him from performing again, was sure to attract a crowded house; and, accordingly, the Haymarket was filled to the cellar on Tuesday evening. The adaptation of "Don Cæsar de Bazan," formerly played at the Princess's Theatre, was chosen for the occasion; and the entrance of Mr. Wallack as the hero, was the signal for four distinct bursts of applause, which would have been continued, had he not commenced speaking through it. We rejoice to say that he was looking remarkably well—better indeed, if anything, young and fresher than when we last saw him, and played with more than his usual spirit in this, one of the best constructed dramas ever written. The piece was otherwise well cast. Miss Adelaide Bernett was an interesting Maritana, a part we would rather see her in (get sparkling comedy than characters of a pathetic kind; and Miss P. Horton performed the boy Lazarillo exquisitely. The applause was renewed at the fall of the curtain, and Mr. Wallack was called for and received again with the heartiest enthusiasm.

LYCEUM.

Mr. Charles Dance is the author of a very elegant little piece produced here on Thursday evening, called "Who Speaks First?" which, without aiming at any intricacy of plot, is so neatly written, and so full of sparkling repartee and pure dramatic effect, that it cannot fail to become a favourite. The situation is a pair of lunatics for a very pleasant three-quarters of an hour. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Maltravers (Mr. Roxby and Mrs. Yates), having had a difference, agree not to speak to each other. In this situation, Captain Charles (Mr. Charles Mathews) arrives; and, in a very cool, off-hand manner, makes each party believe that he is a friend of the other. Some unusual familiarities, however, between the Captain and Mrs. Maltravel bring on a terrible riot, and a duel is about to be fought, when the Captain pulls off a wig, and discovers himself to be the brother of the lady, long abroad, and almost forgotten. All parties make peace friends; and a happy family dinner is in anticipation at the fall of the curtain

Mr Charles Mathews had one of those lively characters assigned to him, in all cases of Dazzle in "A Roland for an Oliver," which he can always render bustling and unblushingly impudent. Mrs. Yates looked and acted charmingly; and Mr. Roxby's bursts of jealousy were exceedingly amusing. We must not omit to mention Mr Meadows and Miss Bourne—the former a feeble old servant, in love with the latter, a flippant lady's maid; both acted to perfection. The applause at the conclusion was most enthusiastic; and Mr. C. Mathews, Mr. Roxby, and Mrs. Yates were called for and appeared. The piece was first in London; and when it commenced there was not a spare seat in the house.

MARYLEBONE.

Mr Davenport and Mrs. Mowatt commenced a fresh engagement at this elegant theatre, on Monday, in Searle's "Shadow on the Wall," to a crowded house, notwithstanding the exceedingly unfavourable state of the weather. Mrs. Mowatt's Adelaide was a very effective performance—as forcible as was Mr. Davenport's spirited rendering of Luke Eccles. They were both loudly and deservedly applauded throughout the drama; and, at its conclusion, honoured with a call, and greeted on their appearance with renewed acclamations. They are evidently great favourites with their audiences. Miss Sanders and Mr. Herbert brought down roars of laughter in their comic scenes; and Miss Oliver and Mr. Johnson contributed to the perfect ensemble of the piece, which was put upon the stage with all that attention to little points so characteristic of everything produced at this house; and for which the management is so deserving of the highest praise. The pantomime concludes the entertainments, to the litter ly screaming delight of everybody. It is very good, now that everything is in quick working order

A new play, written by Mrs Mowatt, who, as we have before stated, in addition to her histrionic abilities, is a lady of high literary talent, is in rehearsal, and will be produced, in a very finished manner, on the 15th of this month. Both Mrs. Mowatt and Mr. Davenport will appear in it.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

STEAM RESERVE.—The Admiralty are understood to have decided upon forming a reserve of steam-vessels at Devonport, on the same plan as under the same arrangement as that of Portsmouth, which will be under the superintendence of a captain well versed in steam, and a staff selected for similar acquirements. Mr. Atherton, late chief engineer at Woolwich, is appointed Superintendent of Steam Establishments at Devonport.

THE WAR MEDALS.—We have been given to understand that there is no chance for a distribution of the long-promised medals for at least two or three months longer—the shrewdness of whom has been confided the task of getting them out having disappointed the authorities in their estimate of the time of delivery from the Mint by a long term. If the parties were fined £10 for every officer entitled to the medal who dies since Christmas, without receiving his long-earned distinction, there is little doubt but that the decoration would be ready for distribution in many days.

NAVAL PENSIONS FOR WOUNDS.—Two pensions for wounds, amounting to £182 10*s.* per annum, have fallen in hand during the week by the deaths of Commander (1841), and Lieutenant Heward Moore (1814). The former was a Trafalgar officer, and one of the last survivors of the long-course medals RELIEF FOR THE WIND-BOUND IN THE CHANNEL.—Her Majesty's ship Rover, Commander Johnson, was despatched on Saturday last from Devonport to the Channel with an extra supply of water and provisions, to relieve any merchantmen in need of succour in that respect, whom she might find detained by the easterly winds.

PEMBROKE DOCKYARD.—The Lords of the Admiralty have of late turned their attention to the unprotected state of this important arsenal. The martello towers have been completed; a large number of workmen are busily employed in excavating the foundations for one, and the preparations for the second are likewise in a forward state. The buildings are well situated for the defence of the Dockyard. A detachment of the Royal Engineers has been placed here to assist in the superintendence of the fortifications contemplated and in hand. A working party of the Engineers has been established under Capt. Nelson, at Pembroke.

NUMBER OF REGIMENTS OR BATTALIONS SERVING ABROAD.—Cavalry regiments (all in India); infantry, 71 battalions or regiments—19 regiments in India; or 8785 cavalry, and 30,304 infantry. The total, in round numbers (officers and men), may be stated at 54,000. It is very difficult to give an exact total, as so many casualties are continually occurring.

ODD WAGER.—Lieutenant Sir James Delaval laid a wager of a thousand pounds that he would make "the proud Duke of Somerset" do him precedency; but that was judged impossible, as his Grace was full seven and more than a man on occasion. Delaval, however, having one day obtained information of the precise time when the Duke was to pass a narrow part of the road on his way to town, stationed himself there in a coach emblazoned for the day with the ducal arms, and surrounded by many servants in livery of the head of the house of Howard, who called out, when Somerset appeared, "The Duke of Norfolk!" The former, fearful of committing a breach of etiquette, hurried down a bank, and thought he was to be sooner safely fixed, than Delaval passed, who, leaning out of the carriage, bowed with a familiar air, and wished his Grace a good morning. He indignantly exclaimed, "It you, Sir James?" "Yes, your Grace, I thought I was Duke of Norfolk." The wager, thus fairly won, was paid, and the town made merry with the stratagem to gain it.—From Burke's "Anecdotes of the Aristocracy;" a very pleasant book of gossip from authentic sources.

BUILDERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The first anniversary ball, in aid of the funds of this institution, took place in the hall of the Freemasons Tavern, Great Queen-street, on Wednesday last, and was numerously and respectably attended. The ladies were elegantly dressed, and among the company were Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart, M.P., and most of the influential builders of the metropolis. The dancing commenced at half-past eight, and was kept up with spirit and animation until a late hour. The amount realised by the proceeds of the ball, and by the liberality of the company, will be considerable.

RAILWAY ROBBERIES.—Letters have been recently received from Maynard and from Garratt, at Bermuda (who, with others, were convicted in 1846-47 of robberies on railway property), stating that they had carried on an extensive system of plunder of railways and steamers, and much property restored), in which several disclosures as to the mode of operation and the parties implicated are made, and others are promised; and it is stated that the right parties are not yet in custody. Williams and Dalton are out there. Maynard is at present schoolmaster on board a hulk. Three of the six who were convicted of these nefarious practices were non-commissioned officers, and not "practised London thieves," and they have intimated that railway servants were "more deeply implicated than themselves." A thorough inquiry into the security afforded to passengers and property on railways is expected, and will be used

The extreme penalty of the law was inflicted on Saturday upon Jas. Reilly, convicted at the Assizes at Liverpool for the murder of Rika Belk on the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, committed in the previous autumn. The execution took place at Salt-hale Gaol, in presence of an immense number of persons. The criminal was only in his 24th year. On the scaffold, he said, also, there was an execution at York that had left 17 years of age, named Mallin, in presence of upwards of 12,000 people. The convict died very penitent; the crime for which he suffered was the murder of a policeman named Ellis, at Ilkeston, at Leeds

THE POPULATION.—The number of persons who have emigrated from the United Kingdom during the year 1848 is as follows:—To United States, 247,581; North American colonies, 39,995; West Indies, 1,294; Australia, 298; Home Colonies, 1,842; foreign States, 12; total, 15,421. Last year the number who emigrated to the same places was 129,851, as near as may be. The Canadas, in their wisdom and generosity, had only 4,577 to receive this year, against 31,678 in 1847.

A SERIOUS accident from the escape of gas occurred on Friday even in the house of Read, by which a house-keeper and a female servant were suffocated. The latter was found in bed, and the former in the act of dressing. Both were in their night clothes. Their injuries being more dangerous than those sustained by the other inmates, a medical man was sent for, who pronounced them to be in a dangerous state. The alarm was given by the cries of the servant, who, on attempting to open the door, found it locked, and, on looking through the key-hole, saw the house-keeper lying on the floor. The door was then burst open, and the gas turned off.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR JANUARY.

IS THE SEA-SERPENT AN ENALIOSAURIAN?

Who shall say that a tribe of animals is extinct? Does not the crocodile occur in the swollen, cheek-by-jole with the plesiosaurus?—and do not crocodiles still exist? Is not the elephant both fossil and recent? Is not the hyena fossil and recent? Do not insects, scarcely distinguishable from our own, exist in the secondary series? We have seen the impressions of the wings of dragon-flies that would defy the scrutiny of an entomologist to distinguish them from those of recent genera. Hence we infer, that although certain species, now found in a fossil state, may perhaps no longer exist in a recognizable form, there is no law of nature, no analogical reasoning, which should forbid the existence of their congeners. Although we may not, perhaps, have the identical species of plesiosaurus discovered by Miss Anning, and described by Mr. Conybeare, yet there is nothing to forbid the existence of a cognate species! So that it is perfectly consistent with the profoundest discoveries of the zoologist to imagine the enaliosaurian sailing in their pristine glory. All that geology would require is, that the Norwegian species should not be identical with those of the Ilas or the wealden Seeing, then, that unquestionable evidence obtains before us an animal, a revival in our methods; seeing that this animal presents many points of similarity to the enaliosaur; seeing that geology offers no impediment to the supposition that enaliosaur still exist;—we trust that it will neither be considered impossible nor improbable that, in certain unknown forms of the enaliosaur, a key to the mystery of the sea-serpent will eventually be found.—Westminster and Foreign Quarterly Review.

LONDON FROM THE "CROW'S NEST."

Whatever may be the future fate of this great city—whether it return to comparative nothingness, or become once more the site of meadows and corn-fields, surely none since the world began has ever offered to the observation of the beholder such a wonderful aggregate of man and his labours. London is not London. It is the central point of the civilized universe, towards which rays converge from every zone and meridian. London is a part of England, of Europe, of America, of Africa, and of Asia. Beneath our feet is the focus within which are concentrated the hope, fears, rivalries, and jealousies of all the other nations of the globe. Briarian London reaches all with its outstretched arms, sufficiently to crush them all. The eye fell from the plane where we stood upon magazines of wealth that were not the property of Englishmen, but placed in their hands for security or profit by those who could trust them nowhere else. Kings and queens were in the [illegible] pearl, as well as for monarchs dethroned and ministers [illegible]. The riches of realms "Cæsar never knew" were deposited there; and productions of the earth, even in regions of which Greece and Rome had never heard. The wealth that [illegible] all the markets of the globe—all that can stimulate ambition or gratify luxury, existed below us in profusion, either for good or evil. From what [illegible] these besides, since man has emerged from savage life, could such a scene have been presented?—Fraser's Magazine

DEATH OF THE POET KEATS.

In the last hour that awaits every man, the embraces of friends to be seen no more, the consciousness of friendless abandonment, and the thought of being after death in the memory of men, are not enough, cannot reasonably be enough to satisfy the parting spirit. We would hope that Keats was not without that "faith which looks through death." It is on feeling hearts, fine sensibilities like his, that the simple and sublime words of Scripture work with most effect. Nor is it easy to suppose that a mind so gentle and so tender could have contemplated the divine love incarnated in the lowly Jesus without emotion and gratitude But his end was peaceful and happy; nor was that lovely imagination extinct in lingered to the last. "Severn," said he, in one of the latest words heard, "I feel the flowers growing over me; and there they do grow, even all the winter long, making one in love with death to think that one should be buried in so sweet a place."—Dublin University Magazine.

ALGERIA UNDER THE FRENCH REPUBLIC

All the inferior offices, and some of the higher, though not supreme, are filled by the natives themselves. This is done with a view to extract the taxes or impose as severely as possible; to bleed, as it were, the Arab and Moslem into seeing that they are paying directly towards the support of the "Infidel Christian," which is merely akin, in their estimation, to the rejection of their own creed. But the French attempt to levy the taxes by means of foreign officers, of course would be the immediate consequence, and another unceasing struggle commence. If the German element is more conducive to conciliating the minds of the indigenous natives, they must lay as few burdens upon them as possible may, they should go further, and lay none. At the best of times, the Arabs are but poorly able to contribute to the support of so expensive a colony as this. In present time, when their country has been devastated, their commerce unpeded, and vast sums of wealth extracted from them, the smallest oppression, will excite private them, and drive them to an open opposition.—Dalman's Magazine.

LORD JEFFREY

If Asmodeus possessed the power to unroof every house in Edinburgh, we doubt if he would bring to light any great amount of hidden talent. All our little celebrities put together are unable to establish the Horatian point in the Modern Athens. As for our great ones, Jeffrey himself is—not to speak evil of dignities—an ens penal. The honourable Lord still dresses well, adjusts himself admirably in the midst of wealth, and is a favourite with the ladies; and occasions the homage naturally offered at the altar of his literary fame. He frankly and courteously discharges all the duties of his position; and, with equal facility, extends his hospitality to the illustrious literary stranger, and expostulation to the unfledged aspirant after literary renown. Dickens, when last in the Scottish metropolis, was Lord Jeffrey's guest. And we have repeatedly seen instances in which Lord Jeffrey gracefully and humanely took the trouble to consider and criticise volumes of youthful poetry not the most promising. But, save on the judicial bench, his Lordship seldom makes public appearance. Only a year, perhaps, he presides over the distribution of prizes at the Association for Promotion of the Fine Arts. But we hear of little, if anything from his pen beyond a few and frequent notes on an advising or a declining character, and the Judex damnatur of the blue and brimstone cover of the Edinburgh Review has become with Lord Jeffrey something more than a figurative, and has proved itself a prophetical expression. On the bench of the First Division of the Court of Session, Lord Jeffrey occupies the extreme left of the Lord President Boyle; Lord Mackenzie, the son of the "Man of Feeling," and probably the most esteemed of the Scottish Judges, intervening; whilst Lord Robertson is seated on the President's right hand. Lord Jeffrey incessantly takes notes and asks questions. The habits of the critic have accompanied him to the bench, and admirably serve to tease the ingenuity of the learned counsel at the bar.—Tait's Magazine.

MUSIC AS A PART OF EDUCATION.

Of all the follies which came to their height in the last century, the p[illegible] notion on the value of music as a part of education was one of the most truly absurd. It was a part of "the wisdom of our ancestors" to look upon the cultivation of music as unsexual! Happy generation, indeed! which could tolerate every vice under the sun in Church and in State, in public and in private, in politics and in literature, at the supper-table and on the stage, while it shuddered at the idea of studying the mysteries of crotchets and quavers; and devoutly believed that the surest way to ruin a boy, both in body and soul, was to teach him how to sing and play.

THE DUEL BETWEEN JERICHO AND DR. DODD.

The ball that went through Jericho's heart killed Doctor Dodd's reputation. The doctor was one of those stiff necked men who will believe their own senses in opposition to their own interests. He was signally punished for his credulity, and we trust, will stand pilloried in these pages as an instructive example of misfortune, bigoted to a faith in its own eyes, ears, and understanding. Why—with a wife and increasing family hanging at his coat pockets—why would Doctor Dodo, in defiance of the world, insist upon enjoying his own convictions? How many men have been ruined by the extravagance; nevertheless, huddling simplicity will not take warning! Doctor Dodo declared that he had been bred to the ground—the Battersea Waterloo—and therefore was under no professional pledge of silence. Again, the gun-shot wound enjoyed by Jericho—as Dodo sincerely phrased it—was superabundantly, so marvellous, since the ball of man was no worse for it—that, with trumpet-voice, the case must sound an alarm to the world. If men were to live with holes in their hearts, there was an end to the delicate mystery of anatomy. Man became no jot more dignified than polypus.—A Man Made of Money.

INSIDE COACH PASSENGERS

Our acquaintance, Major Arthur Pendennis, arrived in due time at Futtoaka, after a dreary night passed in the mail-coach, where a stout fellow-passenger, swelling preternaturally with great-coats, had crowded him into a corner, and kept him awake by snoring indecently; where a widow-lady, opposite, had not only shut out the fresh air by closing all the windows of the vehicle, but had filled the interior with fumes of Jamaica rum-and-water, which she sucked perpetually from a bottle in her reticule; where, whenever he dropped into a brief moment of sleep, the twanging of the horn at the turnpike-gates, or the scuffling of his huge neighbour, wedging him closer and closer or the play of the widow's fan on his own under lobe, speedily woke up the poor gentleman to the horrors and realities of life—a life whilst has past away now and become impossible, and only lives in fond memories. Eight miles an hour, for twenty or five-and-twenty hours, a tight mail-coach, a hard seat, a gouty tendency, a perpetual change of coachman, grumbling because you did not fee them enough, a fellow-passenger partial to sturgeon-and-anchovy, who has not borne with these evils in the jolly old times? and how could people travel under such difficulties? And yet they did, and were merry too."—History of Pendennis.

CHANGES IN AMUSEMENTS.

Not only in its increase, but in the character of its economy, yachting within the last half-dozen years has assumed an importance that was not even dreamt of in the days of the Sailor King. We have now our pleasure craft circumnavigating Arabia, and we have our squadrons of gentlemen-cruizers that put the old pay and political chiefs to utter shame. The Royal Victoria Club House at Ryde would have opened the eyes of the celebrities of White's and Brooks's of the good old times. Suppose Isaac Walton had been invited to join a salmon fish or party for a fortnight's foray among the fjords of Norway, e would first have asked permission to make his will. The descendants of the aspiring sportsmen who took the town by storm when they mastered the harrowing accidents among the Scottish hills, now take their pleasure among the lions of the Orange river, or the tigers of Mysore. You meet young fellows every day in St. James's-street, who have shot their dozen or two of pinnatus—animals that were considered fabulous when Colonel Thornton wrote his book "as big as all the sickness," and who have as much to say to the grouse in a good season as the most consummate old sportsman of the last generation.—"Cravens," in the Sporting Review.

DIMINUTION OF CRIME.—At the Quarter Sessions for the borough of Buckingham, held on Tuesday, there was but one prisoner for trial, a man for fowl-stealing. The Recorder, in his charge to the grand jury, stated that it gave him great pleasure to congratulate them on the state of the calendar, and more especially when it appeared that there had been there in the county during the last calendar, no less a district, and a proof that the law, at least, was respected.

THE EARLY CLOSING MOVEMENT.

THE YOUNG MEN'S PETITION TO THEIR EMPLOYERS

We form no vain capricious wish,
No idle words deliver.
The boon we want is small to grant—
A trifle to the giver;
But great to us as health and strength,
And sweet as virtuous pleasure—
A little time at evening chime,
An hour or two of leisure.

We ask it not that we may throw
A burden on a neighbour;
Nor seek it, coward-like, to shun
Our share of honest labour.
We feel and cherish the belief,
That were the gift accorded,
We'd work with double energy,
And earn it ere afforded.

Nor do we crave those evening hours
For idle dissipation,
For lure of vice, for cards or dice,
Or worthless conversation.
We wish to breathe the breath of Heaven,
When summer airs invite us,
Or when in wintry nights the cooks
That teach us and delight us.

[illegible] new-born work of mind
Our work of hand shall fetter.
'Tis wise ambition to aspire
From petty things to the better
Not that we'd soar above the shop,
Or scorn our means of living;
Though life had something else to give,
As greatly worth the giving.

Oh, no! we'll not neglect the round
Of still recurring duty;
But see and love in leisure gain'd
The charm of moral beauty.
And hope shall make us better men—
Be you the impartial judges;
And wealth as grow in self-respect,
In ceasing to be drudges.

[illegible]
We [illegible]
Hi[illegible]
Its rightful [illegible]
Fifteen hours' toil of thankful hearts
Is better than recruiting,
Than toil of ten and five enforced,
'Mid discontent and grieving.

That we may know the sympathies
Mid ceaseless toil denied us;
That we may taste the mental stores
Which books and men provide us;
That we may share the boundless wealth
Of intellectual pleasure,
Give us, we pray, at close of [illegible]
An hour or two of leisure

So may your wealth, from year to year
Increase like corn-fields growing,
So may your cup of mortal joy
Be full to overflowing;
So when the [illegible] compunctious throb
Disturb your contemplation—
Tf it you refused your fellow-men
The chance of relaxation.

REMARKABLE METEOR.—Tuesday night, about half-past 7 o'clock, a very singular meteor made its appearance in the south-west at a considerable elevation. It seemed to emanate from the atmosphere, and gradually assumed a very brilliant luminosity, in shape like a comet with a long tail; and, as near as could be judged, the main body was at first about one-third the size of the apparent diameter of the moon. The meteor passed very slowly to the southward of the zenith, and disappeared altogether in a few moments.—Edinburgh Advertiser.

REVIVAL OF OLD CHRISTMAS GAMBOLS AT MANCHESTER.

A VERY interesting fête, in that vein of revivalism which characterises the present age, was given at Manchester yesterday week, Old Christmas Eve, which, as the address, we think, beyond even what its most sanguine promoters could have anticipated. The scene of this resuscitated revelry and pageant was the Free-Trade Hall, at Manchester. The fête was the annual party given by the Directors of the Manchester Mechanics' Institution, and the subject, the Celebration of Christmas in the Olden Time, and in no State has humidity pictured in his "Mansions of England," with its pageantry, picturesque and grotesque: its revel rout, and roysatings; its mirth and mummings; and all the accessories that were wont to walk their glorious halo of hospitality around its meetings and hops.

The Christmas parties of the Manchester Mechanics' Institution are now of 14 years' standing. To a considerable extent, the exhibition of [illegible] work was a reproduction of those of former occasions. Subsequent efforts, of inferences to main features; but in the details there were many improvements introduced; whilst the whole of the representations, in variety, elegance, and finish, far exceeded those of any former occasion. In picturesqueness of effect, the processions were admirable; and the mummers and revellers played their parts with a simulated earnestness and a breadth of rude hilarity which gave to their acting a smack of the true antique. Some members of the upper dramatic character of the forthcoming show had gone abroad; the successful efforts of former years were remembered by thousands; and the result was so great a demand for tickets, that not one was to be procured at the Institution on Friday morning. Hundreds of persons applied in vain; and the competition of the disappointed enhanced the price of a ticket from 5s. or 6s. to 20s. This [illegible] have been sold, was in many instances paid. The number of tickets issued was 3200.

The decorations of the hall were far more elaborate and beautiful than they had been on any previous occasion. Festoons and wreaths of evergreens, flags and banners, coloured draperies, scenes and properties, stags' heads and antlers, and scores of other little devices to captivate the eye and give a look of festal elegance to the place, were lavishly employed; and the brilliant light brought out everything with a sharpness which was quite delightful. The company began to arrive shortly after 8 o'clock, and before 9 nearly every seat was occupied. The scene was truly magnificent when the whole of the gay company had assembled. Never did baronial hall entertain so vast a multitude, and in modern times there have been few occasions which have brought together so large a Christmas party

After a flourish from the President, Mr. A. Turner, the heralds entered, and proclaimed, "The high and mighty Prince, the Master of all Revels." The Prince, with a dignity befitting the occasion, advanced to the dais which adjoined the platform, and was duly inaugurated amidst the acclamations of the company and the merry strains of the band. The Prince addressed the audience, distributed his gifts, and the revels began with "The Procession of the Yule Log." The yule minstrels and other followers of the procession were very numerous; they sang the yule song with a lusty vigour which made the hall ring again.

"The Procession of the Months" was this year substituted for that of "The Seasons," and it was not on y a more complete and elegant pageant, but it had about it a variety which rendered it more pleasing. Each month was typified by some well-known emblem, custom, or observance of rural life. The implements of husbandry peculiar to each division of the year were borne in the long procession; and on the banners and flags were imprinted snatches of old rhymes and popular adages. A maypole, "wreathed with garlands gay," was erected in the centre of the hall; and Maid Marian, as "Queen of the May," awarded her presents and favours. The "morris-dance" was performed by about twenty rustics, decked with ribbons, bells, sashes, and other badges; and as they danced, they sang a portion of an old song. So well was this dance itked, that it was loudly encored. "The sword dance," which still lingers as a Christmas custom in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, was given by a number of youths in appropriate attire, decorated with ribbons of the gayest hues. The "waits" formed part of the procession, performing the carol of December, and they sang a blythesome old carol, "I saw three ships come sailing in." The Manchester hand-bell ringers also formed part of the throng.

Next came "The Procession of the Boar's Head," a large and veritable one, duly bedecked with "garlands gay and rosemary," and served up in formal style with minstrelsy. The antique furniture employed last year to fit up the hall was also used on this; and the "Boar's Head Carol" was again sung. Next in order were "The Presentation of the Wassail Bowl," and "The Procession of Old Father Christmas, his children, and his mummers, with snapdragon," which were got up with increased splendour

On the invitation of the Christmas Prince, Old Father Christmas called around him the actors, and the motley band performed the ancient Christmas play of "St. George and the Dragon." The "pictures of the olden time" terminated with the festive dance of "Sir Roger de Coverley," in which all the non-actors, amateurs, &c. joined.

All the processions of the evening having terminated, Mr. J. A. Turner vacated the chair, which was taken by Mr. Alderman Armitage; and Mr. Alexander Henry, M.P., briefly proposed what he was sure would be the heartiest thanks of the whole assembly to the estimable gentleman who had presided over the festivities, for the very admirable manner in which he has discharged the duties of the president, and for the uniformly kind interest he had taken in promoting the prosperity of the Manchester Mechanics' Institution. He was sure all would join him in wishing Mr. Turner many happy returns of the [illegible] year, in health, peace, and prosperity.

Mr. M. Rose seconded the vote of thanks, which he trusted would be carried by acclamation.

Mr. Alderman Armitage, in putting the motion, said he was sure all must feel grateful to Mr. Turner for his excellent address, and his conduct in the chair. The resolution was carried by acclamation, followed by three hearty cheers; and it was briefly acknowledged by Mr. Turner, who said he hoped that none of their guests had found anything exceptionable in the proceedings, and that they would be as willing to come again, as the members would be glad to welcome them, to many future Christmas parties, and super-late the [illegible] of the season in the same manner as at present. (Applause.)

The process of clearing the hall of forms and tables then commenced, in order that the spectators themselves might have an opportunity of joining in the dance. Dancing commenced about 11 o'clock, and proceeded with great vigour until a late hour.

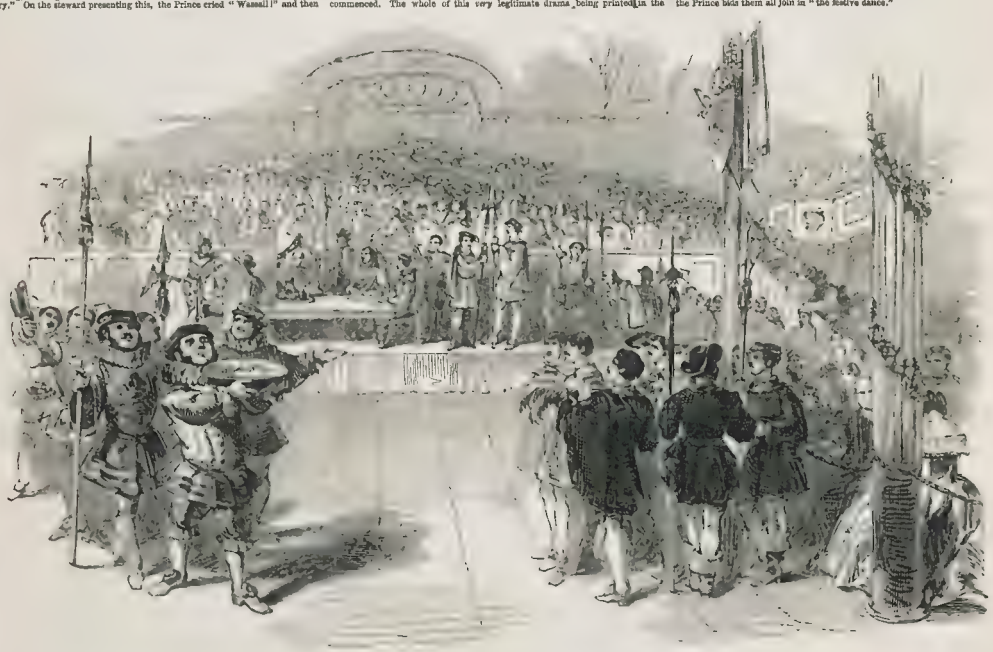
The fête was, throughout, very successful; and it was impossible not to regard it as a quaint, yet a picturesque relief, to the grave utilitarian purposes to which the Free-Trade Hall is generally appropriated.

We have engraved two of the scenes from this "rights merrie" Christmas festival. First is the Procession of the Wassail Bowl, after the Boar's Head had been deposited upon the table; when there, the Prince, having cut portions, by his heralds called for wassail, and the cry was re-echoed by the throng of rustics entering, bearing the wassail-bowl, wreath-d with "garlands gay and rosemary." On the steward presenting this, the Prince cried "Wassail!" and then drank of the bowl; the retainers giving nine hearty cheers, mingled with cries of "Wassail!" We believe the following is the most approved recipe for its concoction:—To a bottle of good ale, add a bottle of old port and a bottle of good old rum, with sugar, spices, &c. (as Mrs. Glasse would say) "to your liking." This is made hot, and roasted apples, slices of lemon, &c. float on the liquor. The Prince and his court then partook of the boar's head; the rustics retiring to prepare for the last procession.

The second Illustration shows the closing glory of the night; when Father Christmas, having exchanged greetings with his guests, recognised the Prince, and tendered for the Royal solacement and gratification the performance of the ancient miracle play of "St. George and the Dragon." This was accordingly commenced. The whole of this very legitimate drama, being printed in the "Book of the Christmas Party," from the Cornwall copy of the most approved text, we need not describe it at length. Suffice it to say, that St. George proved himself, in "fast" phrase, "a regular brick," slaying Turkish Knight, Giant Turpin, "paynim and infidel," and, though last, by no means least, the mystic and terrible dragon"—

A Dragon you shall see,
And a wild worm for to flee.

On this, Old Father Christmas lastly calls for the doctor, and pays his fee beforehand, after bargaining for a cheap cure; and the learned son of Esculapius, with the magical touch of his little finger, resuscitates the whole of the dramatis personæ, conquerors and conquered; and to carry out the humour of the piece, the Prince bids them all join in "the festive dance."



PROCESSION OF THE WASSAIL BOWL.

QUEENWOOD COLLEGE.

ABOUT four miles from the Dunbridge Station, on the line from Bishopstoke to Salisbury, stands this handsome building, to the present uses of which we made allusion in a leading article of this Journal on the 30th of September last. We mentioned, in writing on the subject of Agricultural Colleges, and the advantages they afforded to the country, that Queenwood College was one of them. The statement, however, requires a little explanation, as Queenwood is not an exclusively agricultural seminary, but a college in which every branch of education is taught; and which, in addition to the usual course of classical and commercial study, provides, on a farm of 800 acres, for such young men as wish to turn their attention to agriculture, an opportunity to make themselves acquainted with it, both practically and scientifically. Its principal who was employed in Russia by the Emperor Alexander, in the reclamation of waste lands around St. Petersburgh—is not merely an agriculturist, but an experienced teacher, who is imbued with a deep consciousness of the importance of school, as an introduction to life. The celebrated establishment of M. de Fellenberg, at Hofwyl, is the model, to a great extent, of Queenwood College, as far as the principles upon which it is conducted are concerned. Like M. de Fellenberg, the principal of Queenwood is of opinion that the first business of an educator is to develop the various faculties of the youthful mind fully and harmoniously, and that the next is to give these faculties a proper training, with strict reference to the future destination in life of the pupil. We have not space, however, to enter at length upon this subject; but, having set ourselves right upon the point of agriculture, must confine our notice of Queenwood, as a public seminary, to the fact, that it is one of a kind of which we should rejoice to see many in England. The building itself (of which an Engraving appears above) was constructed under the superintendence of Mr. Robert Owen, and is in fact the famous "Harmony Hall," where that philosopher, if such he may be termed, attempted to carry out on a small scale his views for the regeneration of society, and to establish the Millennium. On the gable of the building appears the inscription, inlaid with flints, "C. of M., 1842." On inquiring the meaning, we were informed that it signified "Commencement of Millennium, 1842." The Owenite Millennium, however, was but of short duration. The disciples consumed more than they produced disputes arose—Harmony became Inharmonious, and the fine building and farm on which large sums had been expended, became an unprofitable speculation. The result was that the establishment was broken up for the benefit of its creditors—that the brethren were dispersed—and that Harmony Hall was shut up, and remained for a considerable time without either a tenant or an offer. Ultimately Mr. Edmondson, of Tulketh Hall, near Preston, was induced to take a lease of it, to carry out on a more extended scale the educational principles for which he is celebrated, and which he had so successfully wrought out in the former establishment. He restored the ancient name of the farm, and under his auspices Queenwood College promises to be one of the most valuable seminaries in the kingdom.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

THIS gentleman, who has lately been elected to the office of Vice-President of the American Union, to succeed George M. Dallas, upon the expiration of his official term, March 4, 1849, is a native of the State of New York. He was born on the 7th day of January, 1800, at a spot named Summer-hill, in Cayuga County.

MILLARD FILLMORE, VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The birth-place of his father, Nathaniel Fillmore, is Burlington, Vermont; and the venerable sire now looks back with fondness, from his well-cultivated farm in Erie County, N.Y., to the Green Mountains intersecting his native State, and shadowing the humble home of his childhood, while he tells of the year 1771, as the one in which he drew his first breath. Then he points to the proud eminence on which stands his own son, Millard, whose boyhood was propitiated by very few of the opportunities enjoyed by those who are fostered by wealth

Millard Fillmore has risen by his own unabated exertions. He was apprenticed to the wool-carding business in Livingston county, N.Y.: he performed with alacrity the duties of the "industrious apprentice" during the hours of day; and at night he repaired to his room, and studied hard as a relief to his daily occupation. Thus was Fillmore employed from 1815 until 1819, when he yielded to the solicitations of the late Walter Wood, and, throwing aside the carding of wool, he studied with his benefactor law and surveying, until the year 1821. During the latter two years he supported himself by his earnings as a school-teacher.

Removing to Erie County, N.Y., he entered the office of a lawyer in Buffalo, and, under his supervision, continued his legal studies until 1823, when he was admitted to practice in the Court of Common Pleas. From that hour his career has been rapid, equalling alone his uprightness and consistency.

Millard Fillmore was elected to the Legislature of the state of New York in 1827, and the two succeeding years again to the same honourable body. He commenced practising first as a lawyer in the village of Aurora, Cayuga County; thence he returned to his present residence in Buffalo in the year 1830.

In 1832, and also in 1836, he was elected to the American Congress. As an able representative, he enrolled his name among those of the most enlightened American statesmen, by his report on the New Jersey Election controversy. From personal motives, Fillmore declined re-election at the close of this Congress, and resumed his practice at the bar, applying his energy and talents to the faithful discharge of his profession.

In 1844 the Whig party of New York decided upon his nomination as a candidate for the Gubernatorial Chair of the State, opposed by the late Silas Wright, the nominee of the Democratic party; when the latter became Governor.

About a year since, Millard Fillmore was elected Comptroller of his native State. His financial prudence has been proved, on many occasions, since his elevation to that office.

Thus, we see Millard Fillmore, in 1815, the apprentice; the school-teacher in 1821; the lawyer in 1823; in 1827, the legislator, the Congressman in 1832; in 1847, the state comptroller; and may exult in 1849, to append, in addition to what precedes, the merited title of "The Vice-President of the United States of America."

STATUE OF THE LATE EARL OF AUCKLAND.

THIS noble Statue of the late Lord Auckland has been executed in bronze, by order of his Lordship's friends, public and private, in India. The subscription for this purpose, amounting to upwards of £2000, was raised on the Earl leaving India, at the close of his Governorship. The Statue was sent out from England early in September last, in the ship Marlborough; and has, consequently, in all probability, arrived about this time at its destination. The site chosen for the Statue is an open space on the Esplanade, in Calcutta, between the fort and town, facing the river, from which it will be seen as a prominent object. The height of the Statue itself is about 8 feet 6 inches, and of the whole, including pedestal, upwards of 20 feet.

The casting, as well as the model, was carried on in Mr. Weekes's Studio and Foundry, in Belgrave-place.

BRONZE STATUE OF THE LATE EARL OF AUCKLAND, BY WEEKES.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE EARL OF AUCKLAND

The funeral of the late First Lord of the Admiralty took place on last Saturday forenoon, when the remains of his Lordship were removed from the Admiralty for interment in the family vault in Beckenham Church, near Bromley, Kent.

Shortly before ten o'clock, the hour appointed, Rear-Admiral James Deans Dundas, the Hon. Wm. Cowper, Captain Milne, and the other Lords of the Admiralty; Mr. Ward, M.P., and Captain Hamilton, the Secretaries to the Admiralty; the principal clerks, and the large master and assistants in their liveries, connected with that department of the state, assembled in the inner hall and vestibule of the First Lord's official residence, and formed in line on each side, through which the coffin and mourners passed on their way to the hearse and the mourning-coaches. There were three mourning-coaches and four, containing Lord Auckland (the Bishop of Sodor and Man), the Hon. Frances Eden, the brother and sister of the deceased Earl, and other relatives of the deceased, domestics, &c. The funeral was quite private. The Queen, the Queen Dowager, and other members of the Royal Family, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the members of the Cabinet, made applications to be allowed to send their respective equipages, but the offers were respectfully declined, as it was believed to be in accordance with the previously expressed wishes of the deceased.

The cortège proceeded without interruption to Lewisham, where the funeral procession was joined by the carriages of the Countess of Buckinghamshire and Lord Bexley. On reaching Beckenham Church, at half-past twelve o'clock, the body was received at the church gate by the Rev. A. Brandram, the rector of Beckenham, who performed the service. The coffin having been deposited in the family vault, situate in the aisle of the sacred edifice, the funeral service was concluded, and the mourners immediately afterwards retired.

The usual respect to the memory of the late Earl was observed in the Royal Dockyards and naval establishments, agreeable to an order from the Board of Admiralty.

THE SURREY THEATRE.

IN our account of the re-opening of this Theatre, on the 26th ult., we briefly stated that the interior had been entirely re-decorated. We now give an Illustration of the superb renovation. The whole has been designed and carried out by Mr. R. W. Withall, architect, Cheapside, and does much credit to his taste and judgment. The stage, which is perfectly new, is 65 feet in depth, having what is technically termed a practicable stage of 30 feet. The pit, and calling, and dome are also new; and the boxes and gallery have been entirely remodelled, and painted and decorated in a light and exceedingly elegant style. The decorations are the work of Mr. Burwell, known as an artist who has been similarly employed on several of the metropolitan theatres. The house is lighted by a magnificent cut-glass central lustre, and ormolu chandeliers around the circle. The whole of the refinement is very tasteful, and bespeaks the liberality of the lessees. The performances, since the re-opening, have been very successful, the Pantomime being an especial favourite with the holiday visitor.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

[illegible] ture, we shall not, shortly, have a rasher on the coals for [illegible]

THE "Racing Calendar" of the 6th instant contained nominations for a great number of influential races, the entries for which closed on the first day of the new year. These add to the interest and sporting excitement during the current week, which being, moreover, barren in any event of account, afforded I am sure for canvassing such a catalogue of racing items as the turf had never known before. In these days of progress, when we select some especial case for observation, we are as insensible of the pace as those who travel by an express train and avoid looking out of the carriage windows. A few instances will, perhaps, serve to put this in sufficiently palpable relief. Let us contrast the strength of some of the great betting races in 1849 with those events ten years ago.

The nominations to the Chester Cup in 1839 were forty-three; this year they are two hundred and nine. In 1839, the Great Metropolitan Stakes were [illegible] twenty-three. In 1849, [illegible] ninety-four subscribers. In 1839, the Newmarket Handicap has but recently made its début; the nominations have already reached fifty-nine. The Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire last year produced a numerous insurrection on the betting with the handicaps, to short nonnes. Now that the very general taste for speculating in the odds has brought this to pass, there can be no question—this is said without any reference to the consequence—if we have not once more a race for every day in the week as was the case of years ago, the cock-pit has disappeared—once as popular a resort as the course itself. Indeed, all gambling, except that on the issues of races, has ceased; so that the account fairly stands, we are gainers on the whole. Such a state of things, of course, generates ill weeds; but their very offensiveness ensures their speedily being rooted out. For example, a scheme is announced, whereof the provisions are, that the nominators will pay the public the round sum of one hundred and forty thousand pounds again-t certain horses for the Derby, the proviso being that the public taking the odds shall deposit a certain sum that they may take with the layers, while the latter get credit for their share of the bargain; or, to make the contract simple, the terms are, that an individual back, as an outsider at 50 to 1, any horse over a field of 200 runners, laying the odds in ready money for the promise of £101, should he win; it being held in especial recollection that the transaction is altogether illegal, and the parties laying the odds only incurring a debt of honour. Between friends this won't be rather sharp practice, with a stranger, such a "deal" might be more appropriately expressed in stronger language.

These outrageous ventures in gullibility must, however, cure themselves: there will be an explosion, and that will clear the atmosphere. Racing is in more prosperous condition than ever it was, if not quite so fashion-d in all its circumstance as we have seen it. The Landlord is in a very slow to the profession of the jockey. Man cannot, unless they be lusus naturæ, ride under 8st. 7lb. the top weight in the majority of instances. Monster studs too—particularly professional establishments—are against the spirit of the sport. What chance is there, with half-a-dozen horses, of winning a good stake in five years? Lord Cotham ran, last year, nine and twenty horses for 123 races, and Mr. Benjamin Green nineteen horses for 112—one of them, [illegible] ran sixteen times! Lord Exeter's, too, was a lavishian stable, in [illegible] aces headed by the Marquis and the Marquis and 25 horses for [illegible] —three animals for 47 of them! These statistics tell their own story—as will the entry for the Chester Cup, with half-a-score in Mr B. Green's account. Betting has now begun upon a scale befitting such a field for speculation. Had Lacaville Gobbo lived to launch his quips on the taste at Tattersall's, instead of his allusions to rashers, we should have had him talking about "going the whole Leg."

BURNING OF THE PARK THEATRE.

THE intelligence of the destruction of "the Park," the principal Theatre of New York, was received by last week's mail; but our Correspondent's sketch of the catastrophe did not reach us in time for engraving in our last Number.

The fire burst forth on the evening of Saturday, December 16, at about a quarter past six o'clock, an hour before the time appointed for the performances to take place. About that time smoke was seen to issue from the rear part of the establishment, which abutted on Theatre-alley, a small street running in the rear of Park-row, from Ann to Beekman-street. The alarm was given immediately, that the Park Theatre was on fire; and in a few minutes the smoke poured from every window and sky-light in the building. Soon flames shot forth from the windows; and in an inconceivably short period of time the whole building was enveloped in fire. When this occurred, the scene was frightful. The dark heavy clouds, which were hurried across the sky by a strong easterly wind, reflected the illumination and lighted up the city so fully, that a person could read ordinary-sized type at a distance of half a mile from the scene of the conflagration. Crowds of persons, far and near, attracted by the glare, hurried to the scene; the fire-bells pealed the alarm, and the whole metropolis was in a state of commotion.

The firemen were on the spot with their accustomed and praiseworthy alacrity. Their efforts were of little avail, and in about half an hour the burning rafters were visible. All hopes of saving the theatre were then abandoned, and the firemen directed their attention to prevent the adjoining houses in Ann-street, Beekman-street, and Park-row from being destroyed; and their efforts were successful. The flames, however, communicated to Earle's Hotel, adjoining, the rear of which was partially destroyed. The injury to the house is, probably, 2000 dollars, which is insured. The fire also communicated to Clarke's House, which sustained trifling damage. They are both five-story houses, which was the cause of their taking fire so quickly. The Park House, a five story building, was at one time thought in imminent danger, though, by the exertions of the firemen, it sustained very trifling damage. The Fountain House, adjoining the east end of the theatre, took fire, but was extinguished without material damage.

In one hour and three-quarters from the time the fire was discovered, the flames were subdued, with a loss of property to the amount probably of 60,000 dollars. It is twenty-eight years since the Park Theatre was burned. There were several reports about the origin of the fire; but it is now ascertained beyond a doubt, that it originated by one of the young ladies belonging to the ballet, while looking at some bills hanging near the prompter's box, pushing several of them against one of the gas-lights, when they instantly took fire, which communicated to the adjoining scenery. Instead of pulling down the whole bundle when they first took fire, she ran from them, and before another could reach the spot, the scenery was in flames, which could not be arrested.

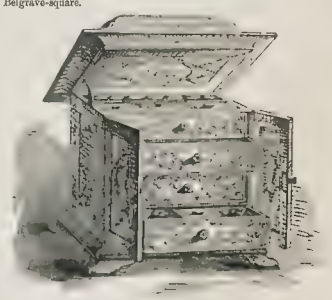
CABINET PRESENTED TO MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

THE pure and disinterested benevolence of Mdlle. Lind in devoting her charming talents to the aid of the charitable institutions of Manchester and Birmingham, would have impressed the public with a due sense of the generosity of this excellent lady, even had she not given several other instances of her sympathetic nature. This kindly devotion of the fair songtress has been marked at Manchester and Birmingham by the presentation of elegant and costly testimonials, accompanied by letters of thanks, from the Committees of the Charities so largely benefited by Mdlle. Lind's liberality. At Birmingham, the present consists of a very appropriate specimen of one of the most beautiful manufactures of the town—a Papier-Maché Cabinet, from the establishment of Messrs. Jennens and Bettridge, whose London dépôt is in Halkin-street West Belgrave-square.



CABINET PRESENTED TO MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

This Cabinet has been purchased by subscription amongst the joint Committees of Queen's College and Hospital; and was presented to Mdlle. Lind immediately after the Concert given by her in aid of the Queen's Hospital, in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on the 28th ult. The form of the Cabinet is square, the panelling ornamented by Watteau-like pictures, and the scrolls exquisitely relieved by pearl. The upper compartment, from which the cover of the Cabinet rises, contains work-table materials. The trimmings are of white satin, the mountings of silver; and on a plate of the same metal, inserted in the interior of the lid, is engraved the following inscription:—

To Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, from the Lord Principal and Council of the Queen's College and Hospital, Birmingham, as a small testimony of their sense of obligation for her very noble and gratuitous services at a Concert held in the Town Hall, in behalf of the funds of the Queen's Hospital.—December 28, 1848.

The drawer beneath is also lined with satin; and the lower compartment is occupied by a neat writing-desk, trimmed with crimson velvet. Mdlle. Lind was pleased to express her great satisfaction with the beauty of the gift, and subsequently visited Messrs. Jennens and Bettridge's establishment at Birmingham.

The following is a copy of the address presented to Mademoiselle Jenny Lind. It was written by the Rev Chancellor Law, and engrossed on vellum. A translation of the address into Swedish, by Dr. Raphall, accompanied the English document:—

Mademoiselle,—The Mayor of Birmingham, the High and Low Bailiffs, and the Members of the Council of the Queen's College and the Queen's Hospital, have accompanied me here that we may unite in paying you respect and honour. We are convinced that we speak the unanimous voice of our vast population when we tender to you our heartfelt thanks for your very valuable gratuitous services in singing at the concert at the Town Hall this evening, in behalf of one of the most useful and deserving of our public institutions—the Queen's Hospital, founded by our townsman, Mr. Sands Cox. Happy is it when it pleases God to grant exquisite talents, such as yours, to one disposed to make such a use of them as you do; for we have heard of other acts of your charity as disinterested as your favour to us. We do not wish you to forget us, as we will not forget you; and we beg of you to accept, as a pledge and a small token of our gratitude, this casket, which we have selected as a specimen of the ingenuity of our manufacturers.

May health, happiness, and success ever attend you in your onward course o usefulness!

THE TYRANNY OF PARIS.

France has gained Universal Suffrage by the Revolution of February, 1848—and Universal Suffrage has gained a Bonaparte; but both gains, as all the world knows by this time, may be set down at very little. She has also gained a new motto for the national coat of arms; but it is a motto which, like many others, used by individuals as well as by nations, is more remarkable for fine words than for practical truth. We do not at present intend to speak of these fine words in their aggregate; we confine ourselves to one of them—Liberty—leaving the as yet impossible Equality, and the Fraternity which is shown by mutual hatred, jealousy, and ill-will, to the calm consideration of all over-ardent friends of humanity, who would begin the political and social regeneration of mankind at the wrong end. The example of France has shown how mischievous it is to speak of equality to an ignorant and violent mob; and how necessary it is to instil, by education, precept, and religion, the sentiment of fraternity in the heart of the people, before expecting it to influence their conduct, their manners, and their laws. As regards liberty, it cannot be denied that the French have made many sacrifices for it. No people in the world ever struggled harder to obtain it, or ever paid a more tremendous price for it. But their present as well as past history shows how valueless is the mere abstract love of liberty among a people who will not condescend to understand and to practise its first principles; and who, notwithstanding all their love of it, consent, either from ignorance, from indolence, or from terror, to be oppressed by the caprices and turbulence of the literate and illiterate mobs of the capital. The provincial French have many virtues; but until they learn to act for themselves, to think for themselves, and to take a share in the management of their own affairs, their private virtues will be of little public avail, and France will continue to groan under a despotism.

The tyranny of the capital dates from the Revolution of 1789. It has been continually on the increase. The Parisians, it is true, are tyrants in practice only, and not in theory. They love liberty with a devotion that has an air of intensity; but they do not in reality know what it means. They are willing to lay down their lives for it; but they have no correct notions of the duties that liberty imposes upon those who would enjoy it. They can neither bear, nor forbear. They often form correct ideas; but they are not contented unless they can cram those ideas down the throats of all who dissent from them. They utter high sentiments; but they seem to have no faith in their vitality, or any expectation that truths can make their way in the world except by the aid of the sword and the musket. In fact, the Parisians are tyrants. Their military education, predilections, and traditions have made them so. Their pride and vanity have confirmed them in the delusion that all the wit, all the virtue, all the worth of France—if not of the whole world—are concentrated between the Arc de Triomphe and the Place de la Bastile on the one side, and between the Panthéon and the windmills of Montmartre on the other. But although they are essentially tyrannical themselves, they will not tolerate the tyranny of others. They have too much pride and high spirit to be contented slaves. Liberty, or something which they depict to themselves under that name, is their own particular idol; and, if all the world do not bow down and worship it, they are prepared to invade the liberty of all the world, and to exclaim like Mahomet—

Believe our book, ye millions, or ye die.

The measure which the Parisians would mete to others they will on no account submit to be measured by themselves. The history of France since the commencement of the reign of Louis XVI. proves how intensely they have hated all tyranny—except that of the military conqueror, who caused them to forget his despotism in the gorgeousness of his victories, and who flattered their national vices so successfully as to make them pardon his attacks upon their national virtues. His was the only tyranny which the Parisians and the French generally could endure. Charles the Tenth was a tyrant, and they expelled him. His successor thought it necessary to become a tyrant also, and they expelled him in his turn. The Republicans avowedly thrust the Republic upon an unwilling people. They established it, as they maintained it, by terror and coercion. The Provisional Government was a tyranny of the worst kind, and it sunk amid the universal hiss of unpopularity and contempt. General Cavaignac could not preserve society from dissolution without becoming a tyrant; and in his place, five or six millions of voters elected for their President a man whose only claim upon their confidence was his hereditary connexion with a tyrant. The people chafe at and overthrow tyranny; but having withdrawn their necks from one yoke, they thrust them into another. In all their revolutions they but change the tyrant: the old form still subsists, and the phantom of liberty eludes their grasp.

But a light has begun to dawn upon the French, and a new struggle will sooner or later take place. The sober people of the provinces are opening their eyes to the fact that neither Charles X. nor Louis Philippe was so great a tyrant as the city of Paris; and that this kind of tyranny—of which Europe offers no other example—is not a necessary consequence of their civilisation, but an excrescence upon it which must be removed before real liberty can be secured. Paris has never paid any deference to the wants, the ideas, or the rights of the provinces. It has laughed them to scorn; and all the Governments that have succeeded each other since the days of the first Republic until those of the Republic of 1848, have, by their system of action, and by their concentration of all administrative functions in Paris, confirmed and extended the unwholesome ascendancy of the capital. They have pampered a tyranny which, though sometimes less, sometimes greater than their own, has eventually become their master. The unhappy Girondists saw the evil, and attempted to combat it; but they adopted the wrong means, and perished in the task. No real attempt has since been made to grapple with it. Napoleon strengthened it; Louis XVIII. and Charles X. continued it; Louis Philippe and M. Guizot extended it; and the Republicans, whether under M. de Lamartine, General Cavaignac, or M. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, have acted as if they would perpetuate it. Paris cannot be forcibly taught the wrong she has committed against the general freedom of the nation; but the provinces, by insisting upon decentralising the Government, and spreading the functions of administration over the whole country, may at length succeed in depriving the capital of those arbitrary powers, which, whether exercised by her mobs or by her statesmen, have been oppressive to the whole people.

The importance of this fact has at length struck M. Guizot. This gentleman, while he was a responsible Minister, ruled the French upon the old tyrannical principles, and, as a necessary consequence, produced a revolt, and then a Revolution, in the capital. He has, however, discovered in his exile that excessive centralisation of the functions of Government is not good. He has become convinced that the apoplexy or furious insanity of the nation is the common result of this weakening of the extremities, and this forcing of all the blood to the head. In his recently published pamphlet on Democracy in France, he has tacitly condemned his own system, by admitting that the centralisation of Paris has operated injuriously upon the general interests of the country, and that rational freedom for all the French can be better secured upon the English system of local self-government, than upon the French system of over-governing all things from the capital. The remedy is a sound one, though likely to be of tardy and difficult application amongst a people who have so much political knowledge to acquire as the French have. Had M. Guizot acted upon that principle, and endeavoured to extend it through France during his nine unhappy years that he was in power, Louis Philippe might still have been King of the French. It is well, however, that experience has taught him his error, because the authority of his genius is still great among the French: and it will be still better for the French if they will take his advice to heart; learn toleration for the opinions of each other; master the simple and elementary principle, that one portion of the natural freedom of each man in society must be surrendered for the sake of society itself, and that too much government is but another name for despotism. But, while the friends of constitutional liberty cannot but be gratified at the new light that has dawned upon M. Guizot, they cannot but feel surprised that so acute a man should have fallen into the mistake of blaming "Democracy" alone for the misfortunes that have befallen France. "Democracy" is his nightmare; but, at the very moment when he condemns it, he vaunts the great democratic principle of local self-government as the best of remedies for the evils of his country. M. Guizot forgets that Paris has in reality been an aristocrat—not a democrat. Paris has invariably spoken democracy, but she has at invariably acted aristocracy. She desired the Government of the "best;" and the best, in the estimation of Paris, was only to be found in Paris. The extension of those English principles, the local management of local affairs, the diffusion of municipal, parochial, governmental, and other functions to the remotest corners of the land, to be administered by functionaries not altogether dependant upon the central power, which M. Guizot recommends—all these, in fact, are extensions of democracy. Thus, M. Guizot blames democracy in one breath, and recommends it as the only salvation in another. This, however, is merely an error in terms. The good advice of the great ex-Minister remains in all its integrity; and there is some probability that the industrious and deserving people of the French provinces have been already predisposed, by sad experience, to take a similar view of the remedy for the evils of France. Should they succeed in distributing over the land the powers and functions now wielded exclusively in Paris; should they acquire those municipal and parochial rights of self-government which the English people exercise; should they learn "to bear and to forbear;" should they be able to meet in public, and discuss their grievances, real or imaginary, without resorting to violence; should they succeed in getting up such a meeting as took place in Manchester last week, without attempting to brew a revolution out of it, they will have made a great advance in constitutional freedom; and, whatever the nominal form of their Government may be—whether a republic, a limited form of the monarchical, or an equally limited Imperialism—they will be, what they are not at present, and what they never can be under their present system—a free people.

ISLINGTON NEW MARKET.

THE removal of the Cattle Market from Smithfield—and, with it, the discontinuance of the nuisance of driving cattle through the crowded streets of the metropolis—has long been an object of public concern, but has been thwarted by interests which ought long since to have yielded to the convenience as well as health of the people. The scene pictured upon the preceding page illustrates a step just taken towards this very desirable improvement.

The Sketch represents the New Cattle Market, situate on the Lower-road, Islington, which was re-opened on the 8th inst. for the sale of cattle and other live stock; the establishment having been recently, at a very large outlay, put into complete order. The area within the walls is fifteen acres, around which are spacious sheds, upwards of 3300 feet in length, and 20 feet wide, having room for 3000 cattle and 56,000 sheep—the entire span of the property being about thirty acres, comprising the Market-house, seven public-houses, thirty dwelling-houses, with all the substantial buildings in the Market, &c.; spacious covered lairs, pens, stalls, stables, offices, four banking-houses, wells, ample water-tanks, with a plentiful supply of water laid on from the New River Company's mains. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. iii, conferring the privilege of holding the market, taking tolls, slaughtering, &c.

This market was projected and the act of Parliament obtained, by the late John Perkins, Esq., of Bletchingly, Surrey, at an enormous outlay; and would, no doubt, long ere this have superseded Smithfield as the metropolitan cattle market, had it not been for a prejudice which got abroad, that, while opposing the monopoly which had for centuries existed at Smithfield, Mr. Perkins was seeking to establish another at Islington. A totally opposite course to this will be adopted by the present proprietors, who express their determination of discountenance anything like monopoly, not only in the monetary arrangement of the company now forming for carrying out the purposes of the new market, but, as regards the public, to remove every error which past experience has pointed out. These instances may be cited in proof—1. The contemplated establishment of a carcase market adjoining the cattle market. 2. Permission to slaughter in the abattoirs of this establishment by the company's servants, or by the servants of the different carcase-butchers, as they may prefer, or at their own slaughter-houses. And, 3, every accommodation will be offered, and every facility given, to all persons connected with Smithfield Market, either as graziers, barkers, salesmen, or drovers, to transfer as much, or the whole of their business, as they may think proper, to the new market.

The days of holding the New Islington Market are Tuesdays and Thursdays for cattle, sheep, pigs, &c., and Wednesdays for horses

The situation of the market at Islington is well chosen, as well as for the purposes of an abattoir and dead meat or carcase market, as it is central to all the great leading roads to the metropolis from the Northern, Eastern, and Western counties of England, and by its elevation well calculated for drainage, it being 63 feet above the level of high-water, or Trinity mark. At the time it was erected, fifteen years since, there were no main sewers near it. But now that there is a first-class sewer within 100 feet of the eastern entrance, and 70 feet lower than the surface of the market, it will be an easy matter to drain it of the surface and waste water.

It is proposed to erect very extensive and complete abattoirs in connection with the market, which will have an ample supply of water, extensive stallage for cattle, storehouses, &c.

Connected with the above, extensive accommodation will be provided for a dead meat or carcase market. The arrangements for pig and horse markets are complete, as also for hay and straw, for which sheds, and stabling for the horses, will be erected, so as to keep it until or after the days of sale.

At present there is a railway in course of construction, from the Camden Town station of the London and North-western Railway through Kentish Town, near the Model Prison, through Highbury, Kingsland, Dalston, Hackney, to the north and east of Victoria Park, through Bow, to the East and West India Docks, and which can be connected with the Great Western, London and North-western, Great Northern, Eastern Counties, and Northern and Eastern, and Blackwall Railways. From this new railway it is proposed to run a short junction branch of about 380 yards, from near King Henry's Walk to the Market, by which means cattle, sheep, horses, &c., will be brought at once from all parts of England and the Continent, without traversing the roads of the metropolis.

The best plans of markets and abattoirs on the Continent will be adopted as models for this new establishment, under the superintendence of Mr Grantham, Civil Engineer, whose Treatise on Public Slaughter-houses has pointed him out as well qualified for the task.

STATUE OF SIR MICHAEL O'LOGHLEN.—This work of art was placed on its pedestal on Monday, and obtained much admiration, though it is not exactly what was anticipated. It is a graceful and finely conceived work, executed with much skill and judgment. The Judge is represented in a sitting posture, and the drapery of his robe falls negligently about his person, which is easy in its pose. As a portrait, the work is not of so much value, as the artist has not done justice to the intellectual and lofty brow of Sir Michael O'Loghlen. But there is an ease and lightness about the whole statue which is [illegible] and the sculptor's genius has produced a work fully justifying [illegible] etc. Mr. M'Dowall is the artist of the O'Loghlen testimonial. FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The speedy dissolution of the National Constituent Assembly, which continues to be urged on its members by petitions and remonstrances of the most pressing character from all the provinces, has occupied the attention of the Assembly itself, the result of which has given a great impetus to the probable accomplishment of that measure within a comparatively short period. On Friday, the 12th, the following propositions formed the order of the day for discussion, the question to be decided being whether it should be taken into consideration by the Assembly, or should be at once rejected:—

"Art. 1. The Legislative Assembly is convoked for the 19th March next. The powers of the National Constituent Assembly shall expire on the same day

"Art. 2. The elections for the nomination of the 750 members, who are to compose the Legislative Assembly, shall take place on the 4th March, 1849. Each department shall elect the number of representatives determined by the table annexed to the present bill.

"Art. 3. Until the period fixed for the dissolution, the National Assembly shall confine itself to frame the electoral law, and the law relative to the Council of State."

After a lengthened debate, remarkable for the brilliant speech of the famous legitimist orator M. de Montalembert, who is advocating the immediate dissolution of the Assembly, took occasion to pass a bitter encomium on the conduct of General Cavaignac in at once retiring from supreme power on the expression of the will of the people, a division took place, which gave a majority of four in favour of taking the proposition into consideration, the numbers being 399 against and 400 in favour of the motion. The proposition was accordingly set down for consideration on a future day, and a committee appointed to report upon its expediency.

M. Marrast, notwithstanding the rumours of his intention to give up the Presidency of the Chamber, has been again elected to fill the chair.

Much speculation has been afloat during the week as to the person on whom the office of Vice-President of the Republic will be conferred, but all doubts on the subject will be set at rest in a day or two

Notwithstanding the vivid interest which domestic matters excite, the affairs of Italy again begin to claim public attention in Paris, awakened by the circumstances of orders having, at the commencement of the week, been transmitted to Toulon, to prepare a steam-vessel of eleven war steamers without a moment's delay. The expedition for which they were intended was kept secret, but it was generally understood it was intended for an armed intervention in favour of the Pope. The Marseilles mail that the great Powers have given their assent. The preparations were going on day and night

A letter from Marseilles announces the passing through the city of M. de la Tour d'Auvergne, attached to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, on his way to Toulon, where a steam-vessel was waiting to convey him to Gaëta. M. de la Tour d'Auvergne is accompanied by M. de Corcelles on his mission to the Holy Father

The Times correspondent supplies the following details on this subject:—"Some time since a convention, or circular, was addressed by the Spanish Government to the Catholic Powers, deploring the scandal to Christendom in the abasement of the capital of the Christian world by the Holy Father, and proposing that assistance should be rendered to enable him to return to his dominions. Subsequently, a more formal proposition was made by the Austrians to the French Government, inviting it to co-operate in restoring his Holiness to 'the free exercise of his powers as head of the Church.' This proposition, however limited in its extent, and however well it may have been received by the French Cabinet, was one which, in the actual state of this country, required the most careful deliberation before any steps could be taken. The question was one of considerable difficulty; and in the Cabinet it was asked how a country, where the right of the people to change a Monarchical for a Republican form of government had been so lately acted upon, could well interfere in effecting a 'restoration' of a foreign Prince in any sense? If I am rightly informed, the 'restoration' was only with a view of enabling the Pope to exercise, without restraint, his spiritual powers; and in this, as it was urged, all Catholic countries, of whatever form of government, had an equal interest. I believe it was at the same time added, that the question of temporal right would not be touched. A similar communication was made by the Spanish Government.

"The President of the French Republic was understood to have expressed his desire to co-operate in such a measure, but before anything could be done, it was considered necessary to communicate with his Holiness, and ascertain his wishes on the subject. M. Latour d'Auvergne was despatched on a mission to Gaëta, and until his return it is not probable that anything will be done.

"With respect to the expedition itself, these preparations are less the result of any specific plan, than for the purpose of watching what course events may take."

General Pelet, of the War-office, is to set out immediately for Turin as Envoy Extraordinary from the French Republic charged with a special mission. No man could be chosen who can give such valuable information to the King. Charles Albert, whether his object be peace or war, as General Pelet.

Internal dissensions appear to menace the existence of the Socialist fraction of the Republicans. A duel took place on Wednesday between M. Pilhes, ex-Peer of France, and M. Charles Delescluze, chief editor of the Révolution Démocratique et Sociale. Count D'Alton Shee was seconded by his friend, and M. Delescluze in the arm. The cause of the quarrel has not transpired.

Judging by the result of some recent elections in the provinces to the National Assembly, the "Democratic and Social Republic" is on the wane in the minds of the ouvriers. At the election of the Indre, the Marquis de Barbançois, the son of a former tutor of the Duke of Bordeaux, was returned last week by a great majority. In the department of La Nièvre, likewise, the representative returned is an old Legitimist, an ex-Peer of Charles X. The former election is looked upon as especially important in its result, as the locality has hitherto been regarded as one of the strongholds of the Socialists.

In the metropolis, also, the progress of events by no means favours the ultras The retrospect of their past brief hour of turbulent authority discloses a state of things in no degree relished by the financial world, namely, a deficit. The Budget of the city of Paris, made up to the 1st inst., shows a deficit of 18,000,000 francs, 3,000,000 of which are not justified by any vouchers. "This," observes the Réformateur, "is legacy of the Provisional Government, and of the Republicans de la veille."

The published returns of the receipts of the indirect taxes and revenues of France, in 1847, amounted to 676,790,000 francs, showing a diminution, as compared with those of 1846, of 146,501,000 francs, and of 1847, of 143,863,000 francs.

A grand dinner was to be given on Saturday last by M. Falloux, Minister of Public Instruction, to the President of the Republic. Amongst those invited independently of the Cabinet Ministers, were Count Molé, MM. Thiers, Berryer, Count de Noailles, d'Escayrac, Sir Pinson, and the representative of some of the most distinguished Legitimist families now in Paris. The list of the guests was submitted to the President of the Republic. He smiled, and replied that he should feel most happy in the society of persons bearing such names

The preliminary proceedings in the case of Barbès, Blanqui, Flotte, Martin (Albert), Sobrier, Raspail, Louis Blanc, Courtois, Cassaignac, Villain, &c., have at length been concluded, and these persons are ordered for trial before the Assize Court of Paris.

Business appears to be on the increase in the French seaports. On Friday (last week) business in this article to the amount of two millions of francs was done at Havre, principally in cotton and sugar. A letter from Lyons, in the Patrie, says that trade is still very dull there, in consequence of the doubts that exist as to the state of things generally, and the bad disposition of a portion of the working population, who have their minds poisoned by Socialist publications. The best firemen in the manufactories are stated to have emigrated to Piedmont, Holland, and England. The letter adds that the elections at Lyons are already preparing for a new election, and that the names of candidates most spoken of as likely to succeed are those of M. Martin and M. Jaubert. We read in the Courrier de Lyon:—"The roundsmen of Charleville and the Ardennes have, within a short time, purchased in the Lorraine nearly 5,000,000 kilogrammes of castiron, cast for wood-furnaces. Orders are coming in in rapid succession, and the foundries in our country are in great activity."

SPAIN.

Accounts from the frontiers of Catalonia of the 11th inst announce that a sanguinary engagement between the Queen's troops, commanded by General de la Concha, and the insurgents, headed by Cabrera, took place on the 7th inst., between Vich and St. Hippolyte. The latter had been forced to retire, after an obstinate resistance. Between 600 and 700 men are stated to have been killed en combat. On the 10th the sister of Cabrera, Donna Jose Arnau, arrived at Madrid on her way to Teruel, where her husband was confined ever since his submission to the Queen.

PORTUGAL.

The Queen opened the Cortes at Lisbon on the 23 inst. with the usual formalities. The Royal speech contained nothing of interest.

A shock of an earthquake was experienced at Campo on the 23d ult., and about a dozen heavy surges were observed in the bay, rolling over the break water on the 1st inst., which undoubtedly were produced from a similar cause.

ITALIAN STATES.

ROME.—The Supreme Junta having issued a decree for the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, the purpose for which it had been called into existence, has resigned. In the evening of the 8th inst., a grand demonstration in favour of the Constituent Assembly took place. The population, the Civic Guards, and the troops of the garrison assembled on the Square of Venice, and thence marched down the Corso to the Square of the People, preceded by banners, torches, and military bands. From this last square the cortege repaired to the Capitol, crying "Long live the Roman Constituent, the Italian Constituent, and the Independence of Italy!" There all the banners were placed round the statue of Marcus Aurelius; and the Abbé A. Rambaldi, having ascended the pedestal, read the decree for the convocation of the Assembly, and delivered a spirited address against the cowardice of the Sovereign Pontiff.

The first general meeting of the Roman Electoral Association was held on the evening of the 6th, in order to choose a committee to propose the candidates for the Constituent Assembly. The crowd was immense, and 24,000 votes were given. A committee of twenty-four members was appointed, which immediately commenced its labours. A letter from the Pope, dated Gaëta, 1st inst., had been received, announcing the rebels with excommunication

The Grand Duke of Tuscany opened, on the 10th inst., the session of the Legislative Chambers with a speech from the throne, in which he explained himself favourable of the war against the Austrians in Lombardy, and the union of Italian States.

PRUSSIA.

Our intelligence this week from Berlin states that the Government had, by a decree, abolished the forced labour exacted from the villagers and towns lying on the line of the country roads for clearing away the snow and keeping the communications open. The work will in future be done by paid labourers.

The election was proceeding with great activity, the regulations of the state of siege having been suspended to enable the public meetings to be held without restriction.

The Minister of Justice had formally contradicted the rumours that the Government had ordered the pending political prosecutions. The courts of law have acted wholly on their own authority.

AUSTRIA

The Imperial Diet, which has again assembled at Kremsier, and the Ministry have assumed an attitude of hostile opposition to each other, in consequence of the latter having declared that the first section of the fundamental law (which has been already read the first time) had given rise, as a theory, to rebellion and murder, because the section had set forth that the people is the source of all power, a principle which, unassisted, caused the murder of Latour in Vienna! On the 8th instant a discussion took place on the subject, and a motion to the effect that the ministerial declaration was a breach of the privileges of the House, was carried by a majority of 156 to 99; after which the assembly broke up in a state of great excitement.

At Vienna much dissatisfaction had been caused by the Ministry having suppressed the Wiener Zeitung, a popular daily journal of liberal politics, called the Ost-Deutsche (East German) Post, because it contained an article which the Cabinet deemed revolutionary in its tendency.

HUNGARY

The news this week from the seat of war is of much interest. The two Hungarian capitals, Buda and Pesth, have been taken by the Imperial army. Upon its near approach, a deputation from the Hungarian Diet, consisting of Count Louis Batthiany, the ex-Premier of Hungary, the Bishop of Lonorita, Count Mailath, and M. Deak, formerly a member of the Cabinet, arrived at headquarters to treat for the surrender of Pesth. Terms of some description apparently refused to receive these gentlemen as a deputation, but he accorded them a private interview, from which, however, Count Batthiany was excluded, and in which they were given to understand that there was no course short of unconditional surrender would be listened to by the Prince. The deputation took this answer back to Pesth; and when the Imperial troops advanced on the morning of the 5th inst., they did not meet with the slightest resistance. Buda and Pesth, the two towns surrendered at once. The Magyar forces had evacuated them upon the approach of the Imperialists. The democratic leader, Kossuth, fled to Debreczin, with the specie of Hungary in bank notes and gold. He was subsequently joined by the Committee of Defence, and by those members of the Diet who had declared the throne of Hungary vacant; his partisans are said to be some 19,000 strong. On the 6th inst. the first army corps, under Prince Windischgratz peremptorily

FINANCIAL AND LEGISLATIVE REFORM.

MEETING AT NORWICH.—The Ward committees of the Reform Association met on Monday evening at the Old Library Room, Norwich, for the purpose of adopting measures to further the movement in favour of financial reform J. Colman, Esq., presided at the chair. [illegible] of the committees from all parts of the city [illegible] unanimously adopted; [illegible] this committee will [illegible] operate with the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, and with every other movement for the promotion of national economy, in order to secure not only a [illegible] of the public burdens, but also their fair and equal distribution." It was also determined [illegible] weekly meetings in large central rooms, to create a strong public opinion in favour of this object. An address was ordered to be issued to the public.

MEETING AT SHEFFIELD.—A numerous and enthusiastic meeting of the inhabitants of Sheffield was held on Monday evening in the Council Hall, for the purpose of establishing a New Reform Association in Sheffield, to co-operate with similar societies established in Manchester, Liverpool, and other towns, with a view of promoting financial and legislative reform. Mr. Joseph Hunter was called to the chair, and stated that the meeting had been called for the following objects:—1. To establish a new Reform Association in Sheffield; 2. [illegible] and determine respecting a request for the co-operation of the Sheffield Liberals throughout the West Riding, which has been agreed upon by the central committee at Normanton. The plan which was proposed for the Sheffield district was very simple in its character. Its objects would be to look after the registration of those who already possessed votes, and see that they were properly registered; to attend to the registration of those electors who have not yet been put upon the register; and to assist and promote the formation of new freeholders, with a view to an increase of the number of county votes. The following sketch of the proposed constitution of the New Association was submitted to the meeting, which declared that—"The objects of the association would be to promote free trade, the ballot, extension of the suffrage, financial reform, and to oppose all extension of taxation whatsoever. That a committee be appointed, whose powers and duties would be to attend to the registration of voters; to appoint honorary or paid secretaries and agents, to examine and prepare lists for election purposes, and defend claims, or make objections to the revision courts; to promote new associations, to administer the funds of the society; to suggest or institute such public proceedings by public meeting, petition, &c., as in their judgment political events, and the state of great political questions may render desirable; and by all legal and constitutional means within their power to promote timely political reforms, and a just and economical administration of the national affairs. Resolutions in accordance with the objects of the meeting were passed, and the proceedings terminated.

STORM, AND LOSS OF LIFE AND PROPERTY.

Last week the eastern coast of Scotland was ravaged by a violent storm. At Aberdeen, it blew a gale; the sea rose to a fearful height, and the consequences to shipping were serious. The Ocean, of Stonehaven, was wrecked at the mouth of the harbour. The Mansfield, of Sunderland, from Hartlepool, shared the same fate among the rocks. Brotherton: the Hebrew, on entering the harbour, considerably injured; the Venus, Henderson, [illegible] from London with a cargo of grain, was obliged to put back, and, on entering the harbour, had her rudder and rudder-post carried away. Throughout the day and night the storm somewhat abated, but towards night renewed with, if possible, increased violence, and was again attended with melancholy results. [illegible] was a strong gale from S.E., the sea running so [illegible] some distance from the shore no vessel could approach [illegible] on Wednesday afternoon, several vessels were discovered in the distance, struggling very hard with the wind and waves. The Isabella, of Dundee, having got ashore on the beach, the life-boat was immediately got out, and succeeded in rescuing the unfortunate crew. Shortly afterwards, the Rebecca, of and from Aberdeen, came on shore, and before she struck, the captain, mate, and [illegible] of the vessel and drowned, leaving on board only two [illegible] saved all by the pilot.

On Friday morning, the Dahlia, of Newcastle, coal laden, was also stranded on the same beach [illegible] Friday afternoon, a man named J. Miller, while sauntering on the pier, was struck by a wave, and before any assistance could be rendered he was lost sight of. Another person, in going along the pier, was [illegible] a wave, but fortunately returned to [illegible].

Along the coast the damage done has been great. At Stonehaven, the lower part of the town was inundated, and considerable injury done in consequence. At Boddam, on Wednesday morning, a brig of about 140 tons burden was driven [illegible] and all hands perished. [illegible] Head, the Mary, of Fraserburgh [illegible] about half-past two o'clock, the sea making a complete [illegible]. A part of the crew were drowned in the sight of hundreds of spectators who could render no assistance. Four men were rescued from the wreck. The vessel, supposed to be the Hermione, of Aberdeen, has foundered near Skaus [illegible] all hands, seven in number, were lost.

[illegible] vessels proceeded to the north pier at Peterhead, for the purpose of securing some vessels which had broke from their moorings [illegible] sea ran very high, when suddenly all of them were swept off [illegible]. Captain Ross and Captain Watson were among the number. The other account represents the number at seventeen. The vessels which the north harbour were thrown down by the violence of the waves, and the destruction of [illegible] in both harbours is described as being very great.

The disastrous consequences of the late [illegible] remain on the Eastern Coast of Scotland, where navigation is so difficult in a tempestuous sea, have thus been sadly increased. At Peterhead as many as [illegible] of upwards of 120 miles, there is no shelter afforded for vessels in distress [illegible] there been a harbour of refuge at Peterhead on Wednesday, the vessels now lying on the shore there would have been safe, and the destruction several of the others now wrecked on the coast would also have managed to run to it for shelter. The case before this is certainly of the necessity for such a harbour, and it is generally admitted that at a comparatively small expense [illegible] could be constructed [illegible] ent to accommodate some hundreds of vessels with [illegible] We trust the Admiralty will have the humanity [illegible] this deficiency.

THE MAIL ROBBERY ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

The second examination of the prisoners took place on Saturday last, when they were fully committed for trial. There was only one brought out at this hearing, except that Poole's accomplice, who had refused to give his name, was identified. On this point,

R. Langley, a detective sergeant in the Metropolitan Police, who was brought from London to identify [illegible] accomplice, stated: I know the prisoner [illegible] one who refuses to give his name. I have known him eight or nine years, but I have lost sight of him the last [illegible] years. His name is Edward Nightingale. I know his father; his name is George Nightingale.

Nightingale, who had shown considerable hauteur during the proceedings, seemed somewhat struck by this testimony. He said he should be heard, and seemed to think that his last rope was gone. Poole also appeared to be considerably unnerved. Neither, however, made any observation.

It was stated that the officers who had been sent down by the Post-office authorities, Mr. Inspector Field and Mr. Sergeant Langley, had made a thorough search over the whole of the Bristol station, where it was supposed that the bulk of the property stolen from the up-mail had been secreted. It was shown that there was no time for the prisoners to have gone further than the public-house, and yet nothing could be found on the search is to be continued.

Soon after the discovery of Poole's connexion with the recent robbery [illegible] was searched by the police, but scarcely a piece of paper containing any memorandum was found, all such documents having evidently been burnt. On his person, however, were found several [illegible] O U's for £20, £30, and £75, showing that since he came into possession of his money (now accounted for), he has had some pressing wants. Poole belongs to a most respectable family at Taunton, but has not been on friendly terms with them since he commenced his present plundering pursuits.

A Sunday paper states that the prisoner Nightingale carried on the business of a horsedealer at Hoxton, near London. His father, George Nightingale, has been dead about six months, obtained considerable notoriety by his [illegible] transactions at Goodwood and other races, where he and one was allowed to have a booth, and where he acted in the capacity of banker.

PORTSMOUTH ELECTION.—The Right Hon. Sir F. Baring has issued an address to the electors of Portsmouth, in which, after [illegible] his appointment as First Lord of the Admiralty, [illegible] that of my colleagues must not give way to my own inclinations. I shall have to enforce economy [illegible] which I have always [illegible] how painful the task of reduction always is, and how heavily it presses on personal interests. I must not [illegible] to the duty of [illegible] exempt Portsmouth on personal grounds. Lord Auckland [illegible] respecting promotion in the yard. I concur in the principle of this [illegible] namely, that, when [illegible] a man should be promoted by his conduct and not by favour, merit or political interest. I will endeavour to give effect to the principle as fully at Portsmouth as elsewhere. [illegible] engage in a galland profession will be entirely [illegible]. I will not consent to make [illegible] gratify my own personal feelings [illegible] ship, much less to injure those who may not have served me, though they have served their country."

CAERNARVON BOROUGHS ELECTION.—Three candidates are in the field, the Hon. Mr. Vaughan (brother to the Earl of Lisburne); Mr. John S. Harford, of Bristol (who was defeated in 1841 by the late member); and Mr Pryse, who has been invited by the Conservatives. The decision of Mr. J. S. Harford were at Aberavon on Wednesday last, he having arrived [illegible] Tuesday. The whole of Cardigan has been canvassed by him. That [illegible] It is not expected the Hon. Mr. Vaughan will proceed to the poll, his supporters being so few.

PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH THE LANCASHIRE OF COUNTY RATE-PAYERS.—There was a large delegated meeting of the boards of guardians from all parts of Lancashire at Newton-le-Willows, on Monday afternoon, to discuss the question of county-rate expenditure and the best means of effecting a more economical arrangement of it. Mr. [illegible] Parker, a magistrate, occupied the chair, and showed that the question of economy had been unsuccessfully pressed at various periods by finance committees of the magistrates themselves. [illegible] clerk to the Rochdale board, [illegible] instrumentality the meeting had been called, then addressed the assemblage at great length, and [illegible] from documents which had been published for the private use of the [illegible] rates, and from evidence taken before committees of the House of Commons more than ten years since on county-rate expenditure and the state of prisons, that it was manifest there was great extravagance in Lancashire in all departments of expenditure—in the county constabulary, in the salaries of coolers and chaplains, in the repair of bridges, in prison dietaries (which cost more than that of any other county), in the expense of coroners, and in prosecutions. He also showed that all attempts, however respectfully intended, to bring the matter under the consideration of the magistrates by deputation or memorial, had been contemptuously repulsed, and concluded that, if those who paid the money wished to obtain any control over its expenditure, they must seek it through the Legislature. He quoted a resolution, in 1836, reporting to the House of Commons on county-rate expenditure, observed, "That the plan of applying the machinery of the New Poor-Law to the controlling of the county expenditure appears to us to be not undeserving of attention." A series of resolutions were ultimately adopted by the meeting, to the effect that, in consequence of the serious amount at which the gross county rate had arrived, they felt it necessary to take steps for a more economical expenditure in future; that the irresponsible power of the magistrates to contract debts and charge them on the ratepayers was a principle so unjust as to call for the interference of the Legislature to give it some retrospective control; that, such control would be best obtained by county boards, composed of magistrates and elected members from each of the boards of guardians; and recommending petitions from every union and township to Government, praying for a legislative enactment to constitute such boards.—The meeting lasted till five o'clock in the evening. There was thorough unanimity in the proceedings.

ADDRESS TO BOROUGHS ABOUT TO ELECT [illegible] REPRESENTATIVES.—The National Confederation of Liverpool, at their general meeting on Tuesday evening, came unanimously to the resolution of forwarding addresses to those boroughs which are about to elect their representatives, suggestive of the necessity of electing only those candidates who express desires of introducing reforms into the present system of government, more especially a change in the present [illegible] raising the revenue of the country. Those who will favour the principle of direct taxation are regarded by the confederates as most eligible.

SEVERN SALMON FISHERY.—Salmon fishing in the Severn commenced again with the new year. The fishermen in the neighbourhood of Worcester have resumed operations with the net with good success, notwithstanding the severity of the weather. Many very fine fish have been taken, varying from 10lbs. to 25lbs each. In the neighbourhood of Gloucester, on account of the fishery has been very unsuccessful. The Severn Fisheries Protection Association are taking every means in their power to prevent the destruction of the old fish, as upon their preservation depends the ensuing summer's supply.

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF TEN LIVES.—On Thursday, the 11th inst., which blew a violent gale from the north-east, about 3 p.m. a large brig, the Agnes Lee, of North Shields, John Clarence, master, bound from Alexandria with wheat, ran into the breakers at Cardigan Bar. The sea beating very high, no boat could go out to render assistance, although several attempts were made. There is no life-boat at Cardigan. The crew launched the jolly-boat, which, being filled with eleven of the crew, the captain, his wife and child (one of the crew, taking to the rigging, was rescued next morning in a very exhausted state), was swamped after leaving the vessel. The fishermen, boatmen, and others on the shore, under the direction of Mr. George Bowen, master mariner, joined hands, and went into the water at the risk of their lives, and saved one of the unfortunate individuals, who were brought on shore quite insensible. The rest were drowned. If a life-boat had been there, the whole of the crew would have been saved.

DISTRESSING SHIPWRECK.—The Albion lugger left the harbour of Broadstairs with a crew of nine men on Wednesday (last week) in pursuit of herrings. On its afford aid to vessels in distress, or to save the lives of ship-wrecked seamen. On her return on Thursday afternoon, when [illegible] miles from shore, a heavy sea struck her, she filled, went down, and all her crew, [illegible] save one (clung to the keel of the punt for twenty minutes, and was picked up by a Yarmouth boat), perished in sight of their homes. The eight persons drowned were all married: [illegible] left widows and twenty-five children. For these a subscription has been set on foot at Broadstairs, to which place it will not be confined. be confined.

INCENDIARY FIRE OF FARMING STOCK.—Late on Saturday night, portions of the cities of Bristol and Bath were illuminated by the reflection in the horizon of an extensive conflagration midway between the two cities. The fire took place at the village of Queen's Charlton, where a number of the wheat-ricks and barley-mows had been set on fire by incendiaries. The flames were not extinguished until one large wheat-rick and two barley-mows had been entirely destroyed, consisting of about forty ricks of wheat and ninety sacks of barley. The flames were discovered in all the ricks at the same moment, and the fire to have been the work of incendiaries. It appears that, about a twelve month six barns were taken by a Mr. Forsyth, who became almost immediately unpopular in the neighbourhood, in consequence of his having introduced an improved system of agriculture on his farm. The immediate offence, it is supposed, was that a new threshing-machine had been erected to thresh the wheat now burnt, and which was to have been used for the first time on Monday last. The property was fully insured.

FATAL FLOOD.—During the night of Saturday last some very heavy rain fell in the [illegible] parts of West Yorkshire, by which the rivers were much swollen. Owing to the force of the current between Rotherham and Castleford, a little before the confluence of the river Aire and Calder, a barge, laden with wool and a general cargo of drysalteries and groceries, named The Yorkshireman, of Bradford, and belonging to Mr. Wood, of Bradford, broke from her moorings in the night, and, with a new threshing-machine on board, was carried down the river with great impetuosity, and was eventually sunk, the captain's wife and two children who were also on board, being drowned.

ROBBERY OF FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS.—On Saturday morning last, about half-past 11 o'clock, a very daring and dexterous robbery was effected in the Union Bank, Ingram-street, Glasgow. Donald Campbell, the porter of the bank, had been out collecting bills in the business way, and on his return previous to the shutting up of the premises at the usual hour on Saturday, and in the course of his out-door visitations he had received payment of a bill for £500, the money consisting of five £100 notes of the Clydesdale Banking Company. With this sum he returned to the bank, which at the time was much crowded, and after enclosing the notes in a pass-book, threw them over the counter to Mr. M'Arthur, one of the tellers, who was at the time actively engaged in some of the business. Ten or fifteen minutes are said to have elapsed from the time of the pass-book being thrown upon the counter until it was taken up by the teller, when the pass-book was found to contain no money of any description whatever [illegible] inquiries have been set on foot by the police, but as yet without any successful result.

BANK CLERK ABSCONDED WITH BETWEEN £700 AND £800.—In the village of Carluke, Lanarkshire, there has been for a number of years past a branch of the British Linen Company's Bank. The manager is Mr. J. Gilchrist, of Gilfoot; and for some time past he had had for his assistant and clerk a young man named Robert Wylie, from Edinburgh. Wylie lodged in the house of Dr. Fairbairn, and on Friday morning, when he left his lodgings, about the usual time, he remarked to the servant girl that he would not return till the next morning. This struck the girl as being something singular, and she afterwards mentioned the circumstance to her mast; but Wylie having been rather irregular in his habits of late, it did not make any particular impression on his mind. On Saturday, however, Mr. Gilchrist asked Mr. Bookless's to inquire after his clerk, he that morning having received a letter signed "Somerville," but without a date, intimating that his friend Wylie had received an accident to his ankle, or something of the kind—on the writer's stair, but that he would be able to be at the bank on Saturday evening in time to assist in balancing for the bank on Monday. The receipt of the letter, combined with the reasons given by Dr. Bookless's servant Wylie left the house that morning excited a suspicion that something might be wrong; and on Mr Gilchrist going to the bank, he found that a tin box, placed in the safe on Thursday night, had been rifled of the contents, to the amount between £700 and £800, and information taken away consists of Bank of England notes for £5, £10, and £20; and gold to the amount of £100. It is also supposed that he may have notes with him of the British Linen Company's Bank, which he may have exchanged for specie.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY OF JEWELLERY AT BIRMINGHAM.—On Wednesday, at the police-office at Birmingham, two men, named Isaac Jacobs, a hawker, and Thomas Beach, were charged with the following robbery:—Mr. F. Webb, jeweller, of Hockley, on the evening of the 10th inst. sent his shopboy, named John Horton, with a case of jewellery, consisting of gold brooches, shirt-pins, studs, and bracelets, of the value of between £50 and £60, to the house of Mr. Webb's house. The boy Horton accordingly left with the parcel, and as he was going along the street he was met by a young man near St. Paul's-square. The man asked him if he was out of work, and after referring to the [illegible] man he worked for Mr. Webb; on which the man said, "I know him very well." The man then asked how much he got from Mr. Webb, and in replied, "Two shillings a week;" when the man said, "All the boys at my shop have 4s. 6d. a week, so shop is in Great Charles-street; and if you have a mind to work for me, I will give you 4s. a week, and a pair of boots every two months for running errands." He [illegible] the man what he worked at, and he answered that it was guard chain [illegible] for watches, and that he would come to his (the boy's) brother on the following Sunday, and ask her if she would let him work for him. The man then wished witness to go with him and see the kind of work he had for him to do, when they went up an entry, and as they were going up, the man said to him, "The will be after asking you the name of a gentleman in Hall-house Lane," on which Horton asked him if he would take care of the parcel while he went up to see the work in the shop. He man said he would do so, and that he would stay at the bottom of the entry. The lad then gave him the parcel, and he said he would stay there till he came back again. The man told him to ask for a gentleman in the shop; but when he went to inquire for the person, he was told there was no such person. The man came back, and told the boy the man was gone. Horton at the court identified the prisoner Beach. Policeman Tandy, after producing a number of brooches and two pair of bracelets, stated that on Friday night he apprehended the prisoner Jacobs at Hall-House Lane, Lodge-street; and, on searching him, found upon him a pair of bracelets and a large brooch in a case, these now produced. The prisoners were committed for trial.

EXAMINATION OF ARTICLED CLERKS.—The examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys will take place on Tuesday, the 23d instant, at half-past nine in the forenoon, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane, and will commence at ten o'clock precisely. The articles of clerkship and assignment (if any), with answers to the questions as to due service according to the regulations approved by the judges, must be left with the Secretary on or before Thursday, the 18th inst. THE BISHOP OF EXETER AND MR. GORHAM.—On Monday last, the Attorney-General applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ to be directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to inquire into the truth of the matters stated in a libel has been joined in a quare impedit by the Crown against the Bishop of Exeter, for refusing to admit the Rev Mr. Gorham to a living in the diocese of [illegible]. The Bishop alleges that he has examined Mr Gorham, and found that he held certain doctrines contrary to those of the United Church of England and Ireland. The particular case in point is, the doctrine of spiritual regeneration [illegible] sacrament of baptism. This Mr. Gorham is said to deny, and the Archbishop will be called upon to decide as to the correctness or incorrectness of Mr. Gorham's opinion.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN SOUTH DEVON.—His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury has a somewhat lengthened reply to the memorial addressed to him by the lay members of the Church residing in Plymouth and [illegible] on several alleged innovations of some of the [illegible] clergy, and some questionable doctrinal sentiments of the Rev. W. Maskell, [illegible] Chaplain to the Bishop of Exeter. The Archbishop thanks the memorialists for [illegible] the Church: [illegible] clergy, to whom the Bishop of the diocese [illegible] brethren of the present day, so as to acquiesce in those slight deviations from the Rubric which [illegible] has sanctioned, and which had not been reproved by competent author [illegible] standing to a wish of the memorialists that the attention of the Legislature should be called to the subject, his Grace proceeds: "[illegible] time may possibly arrive when such a change as you contemplate [illegible] effected without occasioning far greater evils than those which it [illegible] to remedy. It is, however, by no means to be acknowledged that such a time is not yet [illegible] a season of excitement is no season for reasonable deliberation." The Archbishop concludes: "I can scarcely hope that these remarks will prove satisfactory to those who seem to have expected more from my interference than I possess the power, or see the possibility, of accomplishing;" and adds an entreaty that all would unite with him in supplicating the Great Head of the Church to grant to every [illegible] of the same spirit of a sound mind and a [illegible] judgment." The meeting at which the reply was read, was, as the Archbishop expected, dissatisfied with the result of their memorial; and came to a determination to address the Queen on the subject.

Mr. Bethune, Mr. Elliot, and others, to the throne in the pavilion that had been erected for the occasion, the band playing the national air. The brethren of the mystic tie also all hore the Royal Arch Apron of a sublime order their own fashion, by [illegible] both hands high in mid-air, and the bringing them down again [illegible] with a most distinct stroke.

After this, Dr John Grant (as Grand Master of the [illegible] and its temporary [illegible] conducted his Lordship to a seat on the eastern side of the platform which was to receive the [illegible] and stone [illegible] and the ceremonial of the [illegible] one brother produced a small square parchment containing the current coin of the country, another, a second bottle, containing the plan of the hospital and the local publications of the day, [illegible] Star and [illegible] a third (Dr. Mouatt), the silver tablet; and a fourth, the silver trowel. Each article in turn was touched by his Lordship; the inscription upon the tablet also read, at the request of the Grand Master, who then proceeded to place the two first into recesses formed in the platform for the [illegible] and [illegible] Grant] an opinion as to whether or not they would be laid in high estimation two or three thousand years hence.

The tablets were next presented to Major-General Sir J. H. Littler and Dudley Hill, the Bishop, and the members of council present, to be read.

This done, the Grand Master said that nothing remained for him to do but, with the consent of the Governor-General, who had been pleased to do honour to the occasion by his presence, to lay the corner-stone of the [illegible] hospital. The act, however, must be taken to be essentially that of his Lordship himself, who was to the east of the platform, and he (Dr. Grant) must be regarded as only the medium of its performance.

The Grand Master then called for the cement; but, before proceeding to use it, he remembered [illegible] tables which they have just read, and demanded to know whose Brother Henry Elliot was, that he might be called upon to discharge the office.

Mr. H. Millett responded from the midst of a crowd, saying he was without an apron.

A [illegible] Master summoned him forward notwithstanding, saying he was a right sterling man and mason, apron or no apron.

Mr. Elliot complied, reading the inscription as follows:—

Fred. J. Mouat, M.D. [illegible] OF THE PLATE.

The money for building the Hospital was [illegible] partly by public Subscriptions, three Monthly Allowances [illegible] Fund, and the Government [illegible] rupees [illegible] 30,000. A further sum of Co [illegible] 000 was contributed to this purpose [illegible] 50,000 was a munificent donation for the benefit of the City, by Baboo Peruth Chunder Mookerjee [illegible] a sum of money raised by Lottery for the improvement of Calcutta. The ground on which it stands, of the value of rupees 12,000, was generously given by Baboo Maity Lo. Seal.

The Grand Master now, stepping with cement the recesses into which the glass bottles had been put, placed the tablet over them, and covered it with mortar likewise. He then plunged the trowel, used in tin, into the mortar, which I spread over the stone in the proper manner; after which he drew the silver trowel out of its tin sheath, and presented it to his Lordship, expressing a hope that it would long be an heir-loom in his family.

The instrument is set in an ivory handle, having a view of the Fever Hospital, his Lordship's arms, the Collar and Cross of the Order of the Thistle, and several masonic devices upon it; and, considering the short, very short space of time in which it was got ready, it does the greatest credit to the artistic skill and taste of the Messrs. Lutty brothers.

[illegible] at the Universal Grand [illegible] which we have now laid, and that we may be enabled, by his Providence, to finish this and every other virtuous undertaking." The brethren replied with the masonic answer, "So mote it be."

The Grand Master next poured a cornucopia full of corn, a vase filled with wine, and another containing oil, all of which had been previously touched by Lord Dalhousie, upon the corner-stone, exclaiming, "May the all-bounteous Author of Nature bless this city with corn, wine, and oil, and with all the necessary conveniences of life." The brethren replied, as before, "So mote it be."

The Grand Master, then addressing himself to the Governor-General and the rest of the company, feelingly expressed the gratification he had experienced in taking part in the ceremony, and characterised "the design of founding so noble an institution as one of the most eminently palpable and satisfactory proofs that a great, wise, and liberal Government could give of its deep anxiety for the welfare of the people. The building, of which the corner-stone had been laid this evening, is supplemental to the Medical College, and will prove a sanyium that was much needed for the sick; while it will, at the same time, prove instrumental in the advancement of science. In proportion to the amount of civilisation in any country will be found the solicitude for human suffering. Tell me," said the Grand Master, "of any country where the sick and the poor are not cared for, and I will at once say, that, whatever its pretensions, it is a country or city in a low state of civilisation. (Hear.) It is a subject of honest pride to us, that the founding of such edifices as hospitals and infirmaries, and the establishment of funds for their due maintenance and support, is a feature of Christian civilisation, and of Christian civilisation alone. I hope that the spectators of this scene do not consider it as an idle pageant, but one fraught with a moral meaning.

"I consider," added the Grand Master, specially addressing Lord Dalhousie, "it to be a happy omen for your Lordship, that the very first appearance which you have made in public before the people of Calcutta, has for its object the foundation of an institution which is to prove a temple of piety, of peace, and of mercy, to the hundreds of the sick, the homeless, and the friendless. When the generation that is now standing around me will have long passed away, the significant ceremonial of this day will still have a meaning and a moral, and be gratefully appreciated in the recollections of the living. It has been a ceremonial of forms; and I am aware that in those forms were many things which appeared without a purpose to the crowd at large assembled here to-day: but let them receive the assurance from me, that every one of those forms which, as a mason, I adopted to-day, is pregnant with a meaning expressive alike of our hopes for the future and of thanksgiving to God for the bounty which He bestows upon us, for the peace which He suffers us to enjoy, and for the illustrious Head and Governor whom He has given us, in whom we place the most implicit trust and confidence." (Hear, hear.)

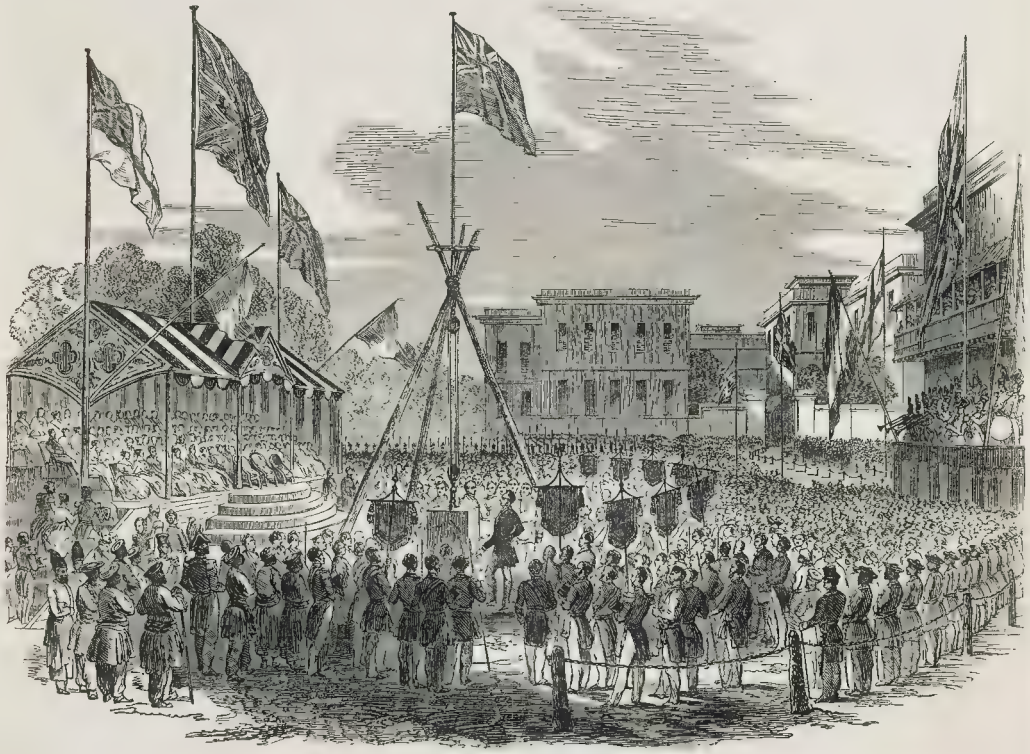
The Governor-General now rose and said:—"Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master, Right Worshipful Senior Grand Wardens, and brethren all: It is a matter of the highest gratification to me that it has been in my power to be present to bear a part in the proceedings of this evening. It is gratifying to me equally in my capacity of a public officer in this country, and of a brother of the masonic craft. It is in the highest degree gratifying to me, that, having been, from circumstances connected with public duties, deprived for some years of the opportunities of social intercourse, and the exercise of the functions of a member of the masonic fraternity, I find myself, thousands and thousands of miles away from the point at which I left them, called upon to renew my communication with friends in private life, and aid, as a brother mason, in works of public charity and beneficence. Ages and ages have passed away since you, my brethren, have ceased actively to engage in the practice of your arts; but, though magnificent monuments of your skill cover the face of England and Europe in edifices and buildings more noble, of superior architectural beauty, and of more extended usefulness than the Calcutta Fever Hospital may be, you will have more reason to pride and congratulate yourselves, regard being had to circumstances, upon the share you have taken this evening in the discharge of your Masonic duties in laying this corner-stone for an hospital for the poor. I venture to express to this assembly the high admiration I felt upon learning, from the records of the Indian Government, of the liberality of this community in contributing so princely a fund to the laudable and admirable purpose of founding a charity Fever Hospital for the poor of this land; and I beg to offer the tribute of my humble, but just and sincere, admiration, to the honourable gentleman who placed so large and munificent a donation at the disposal of the Government, and, upon the part of the Government, to tender to him my warmest thanks for the ready and cheerful acquiescence which he gave to its being applied in furtherance of the project of founding a Fever Hospital for Calcutta."

His Lordship then explained that he had proposed that the funds left at the disposal of the Government should at once be added to the contributions raised for the Calcutta Fever Hospital, so that the aggregate might be adequate for the completion of the building. "Now that the corner-stone has been laid," said his Lordship, "I hope that, when I return among you after the temporary separation which the exigences of the public service require, I shall find that the edifice itself will have far advanced towards completion, holding out an object of emulation to the wealthy inhabitants of Calcutta, as an institution which will help to spread the best for the poor in sickness, afford a home to the houseless, give skilful friends to the friendless, and extend the hand of succour and protection to the afflicted and forlorn. (Hear, hear.) The implement, Right Worshipful Grand Master, which you have presented to me, I shall retain with great and constant satisfaction; and if it shall please God to preserve my life, it shall serve to recal, years hence, the grateful memory of the imposing and most interesting ceremony of the laying of the corner-stone of a public fever hospital for the capital of British India, which I have witnessed this evening." (Loud cheers.)

At the conclusion of his address, his Lordship was conducted by the Grand Master and his brethren to his carriage, as was the Bishop and Sir John Littler; and the assembly dispersed.

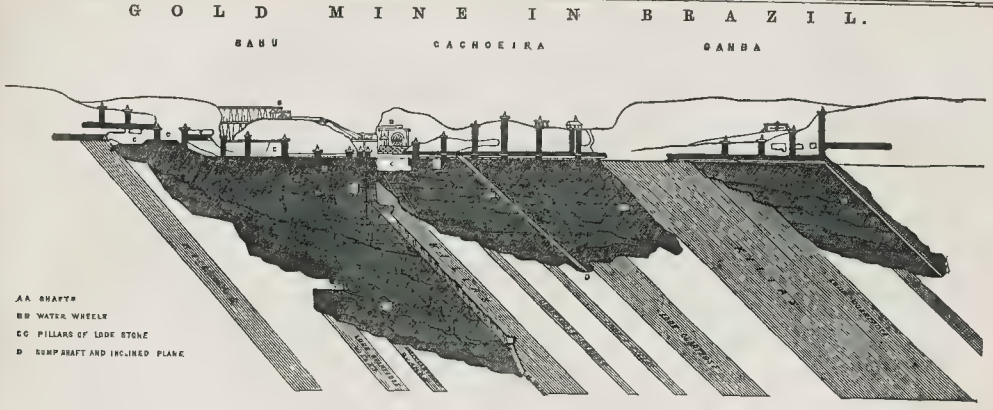
The ceremony must, altogether, have been a splendid spectacle. In the Indian News, whence we have condensed our report of the proceedings, it is stated that "the concourse of people collected on the occasion was immense. The scene that presented itself was altogether highly picturesque and imposing, and must have been particularly so to those who had never before witnessed anything of the kind. The Masonic brethren, all arrayed in their richest costumes, with the setting sun glinting upon their glittering decorations; the thousands of natives grouped around them; and, though last not least, the ladies, who, seated in a raised pavilion, graced the ceremony with their presence, all combined to produce an effect which it is easier to imagine than describe."

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.



THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE MEDICAL HOSPITAL, AT CALCUTTA.

GOLD MINE IN BRAZIL.



THE MORRO VELHO MINE.—STOPING SECTION.

THE gold deposits in California—it has been remarked by our contemporary, the Mining Journal—bear considerable resemblance to those which enriched the Paulistas in Brazil. Hence, an illustrated description of the most productive of the latter mines may be interesting to our readers; and for this purpose we select the Morro Velho, in the province of Minas Geraes, about 300 miles distant from Rio Janeiro. It is only in comparatively recent times that attempts have been made to work the mines in the mountains of Brazil; and the Morro Velho has proved a rich reward for British enterprise.

The Mine of Morro Velho was worked for several years by the Padre Freitas, who sold the property, about twenty years since, to the late Captain Lyon, R.N., and partners; and these gentlemen, in 1834, transferred the mines, estate, &c., to the St. John del Rey Company. On their taking possession, the lode was worked like a quarry, the ore being above the level of the road. The ground worked by the old proprietors has, however, been considerably opened out in length, and other lodes immediately contiguous to it added.

The depth of the mines is about 60, 40, and 40 fathoms, respectively; and the pumping and hauling arrangements are most complete and efficient. There are about 1100 persons now employed; and monthly about 6000 tons of ore are stamped by 96 stamp-heads, moved by six water-wheels. The ore is crushed by iron stamp-heads, weighing about 200 lb. each, each head giving from sixty to seventy blows per minute. The stone, as it is pulverized, is washed by a stream of running water through very fine copper grates, and then is carried down a slightly inclined plane, covered with hides, which arrest the gold, and the heaviest particles of the sand, while the earthy matter passes away.

The skins or hides are taken up every two hours, and washed in separate boxes. The sand of the three head skins (those next the grates) is sent direct to the amalgamation house. The lower skins, being much poorer, are again passed over the strakes.

The process of amalgamation is very simple. The sand is put into barrels with quicksilver, and revolved quickly by a water-wheel for twenty or thirty hours, until minute examination proves that all the gold has been taken up by the quicksilver. The contents of the barrels are then gradually poured into the saxe (a long inverted box moving horizontally in a trough), in which the quicksilver (or rather amalgam) is deposited, the sand being washed away at either end. Every ten days the saxe is opened, and the quicksilver (or amalgam) is passed through chamois leather, which retains the amalgam, and this is burnt off in a furnace, yielding from 20 to 35 per cent. of gold.

The number of shares in the St. John del Rey Company's possession is 11,000 scrip; and the annual profits are stated at £40,000.

We find the position of the company thus given in the Mining Journal of the 6th inst.:—"This company work three mines contiguous to each other, and drained by the same water-wheel; the lode in two of the mines varies in width from 8 feet to 32 feet, averaging 14½ feet; and the third, the Gamba, 4 feet 7 inches. The lodes dip bodily at an angle of 46°, at which incline the pumps are carried, and on the same plane the kibbles from the stopes under the inclined shaft are hauled to surface. There are two water-wheels for drawing stuff; one for the saw-mill; and one at the reduction-house for working the amalgamation barrels; and six others at the stamping-mills, working 96 heads. The whole body of the deposit between the walls gives gold, yielding in different sections ⅛ to ⅝ oitavas to the ton, 104 oitavas being equal to 1 lb. troy. In the Gamba Mine, lines of quartz, running into the country, broken for the convenience in working, give 1 to 1½ oitavas: each section of the mine is very regular in its contents. The average produce for 1847 was 4·21 oitavas per ton, which was worth, in London (reel), 7s. 7d. per oitava, or £39 16s. per lb. troy. A cubic fathom of the deposit contains something more than twenty tons; and each fathom sunk in the three mines admits of about 9000 tons being broken, and the stopes kept in order. Westward, a continuation of the deposit near the surface has lately been ascertained, and is already opened upon, to the extent of 19 fathoms from 8 feet to 12 feet wide, which adds further to the resources of this magnificent mine. The new ground is close to the stamps; and there is no doubt, we are assured, of its continuance westward, as there are considerable excavations of the 'old' people in that direction. This mine is now giving a clear profit of above £3000 per month; and, humanly speaking, a great increase is certain, as a powerful set of new stamps has just been completed."

We are happy to perceive, by references to the last published report of the company, that the treatment of the negro force is by them regarded as an important and interesting question.

In the plan of the Mine, showing a section of stoping ground, the white represents the lode or stone from which the gold has been extracted.

The two lower illustrations show the mode by which the water is conveyed to the works, and the economy of a stamper-mill.

In the centre Illustration we have a view of Morro Velho Mine, taken from behind the Caza Grande, and showing the general economy of the works above ground.

BRITISH EMIGRANTS TO THE GOLD MINES.—On Wednesday the Royal Mail steamer Great Western left Southampton with the West India mails. She took out nearly 100 passengers, amongst them were Mr Barkly, the Governor of British Guiana, and several persons bound for San Francisco, vid Panama. Amongst the cargo was a number of large bundles of pickaxes and shovels, destined for California. It was noticed that the personal baggage of the passengers for Chagres was of extraordinary weight, and was supposed to contain instruments used in the extraction of the precious metal in the gold regions. Through some misunderstanding, several friends of the passengers, who were on board to see them off, were carried off in the Great Western, and will be obliged to return with the pilot, who leaves the steamer in the English Channel.

THE ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.—The Sandwich Island paper, the Polynesian, the recent numbers of which contain constant references to California, gives a series of instructions to passengers in crossing the Isthmus from Chagres to Panama, by a party well acquainted with the route, which convey a vivid idea of some of its characteristics:—"Arrived at Chagres," he says, "get your luggage passed at the Custom-house, and proceed up the river as soon as possible. Before starting, however, see that the awning of your canoe is in good order and covered with tarpauling, and also that the bottom of the canoe is properly 'dunnaged,' that is, laid with long strips of wood to keep your luggage or bed from getting wet, should it rain or the canoe leak during your passage up the river to Cruces. Provide a mattress and bolster to spread under the awning. Stow your luggage so as to keep the ends of your awning open; you will thus preserve a free circulation of air, and find the temperature less oppressive. Your canoe men will often be inclined to stop. You must observe, however, to their doing so. Give them time to breakfast; they will afterwards eat something probably during the day in their canoe, and dine or sup when you stop for the night. It is advised that you sleep in your canoe. Should you, however, decide upon passing the night in one of the huts which are to be found on the banks of the river Chagres, you must provide yourself with a hammock either at Carthagena or at Chagres. They are to be bought at from 4 dols. to 8 dols. each. Ask the steward of the steamer which conveys you to Chagres to prepare you a basket of provisions sufficient for three days. Provide yourself with six "Etna," and a couple of soda-water bottles full of spirits of wine. Take also a corkscrew, half a dozen wax candles, a lantern, a tin box of lucifer matches, and a tin mug to drink from. The water of the river Chagres, a few miles above the bar, is fresh, clear, and agreeable to the taste. Do not be tempted to bathe, however, on any account, the under-current being very strong and dangerous, and the river infested with alligators, with which the river abounds, considerable. If your store of provisions fail you, fowls and eggs are to be procured; milk, too, may generally be purchased in the morning at most of the "ranches" or huts on the river; your canoe-men will show you where. Never travel in your canoe on the Chagres at night if you can avoid it, as the river abounds with rapids, trunks of trees, &c., which render the passage up or down the stream dangerous after dark. Also be careful not to drink something in the morning before starting, as a preservative against the raw fog which generally then prevails. Efforts will be made to induce you to stop at Gorgona, and not to proceed to Cruces. Do not be persuaded in, however, but proceed to Cruces, the road thence to Panama being shorter and better. In the rainy season the Gorgona road is impassable; the Cruces road is available all the year, and except that it is rougher from being more stony, it is in every respect far superior. Exceptional covers should be fitted to your portmanteau and other luggage before you land there, and your clothes will probably get soaked through. An European, unused to the climate of the Isthmus, can have no idea of the torrents of rain which fall there. A light oil silk cloak is of great use. Arrived at Panama, proceed at once to the Custom-house with your luggage, and then take up your quarters at the Posada del Istmo till the packet sails."

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1849.

THE Ministry—which at one time appeared to be threatened with dissolution, or dislocation, by the death of Lord Auckland—has been made whole again by the accession of Sir Francis Baring to the vacant post of First Lord of the Admiralty. Overtures were in the first instance made to Sir James Graham; but they are understood to have been respectfully declined; possibly, from no difference of opinion existing between him who was a Whig in 1835, and the Whigs of 1849, but because his political fortunes are attached to those of a more popular and successful leader than Lord John Russell. Sir Francis Baring was once the Whig Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he was shelved to make room for Sir Charles Wood, whose connexion with the family of Grey was considered to give him a paramount claim to office. Sir Francis endeavoured to repay this slight by a vigorous attack on the Whig Budget, and on the obstinacy of the Ministers in persisting to re-cognise no difference between fixed and fluctuating incomes. It is to be hoped that now he is in office with his old friends he will retain the same opinions, and that the country will have the benefit of them when the question of direct and indirect taxation shall come before the House, as it is sure to do at an early period of the session.

The Ministry thus remains entire and compact, and has already sounded the note of preparation for the ensuing campaign. It has been announced on authority that her Majesty will open Parliament in person; and that the Ministers have fixed upon Lord Harry Vane, a younger son of the Marquis of Londonderry, and member for South Durham, to move, and upon Mr. E. H. Bunbury, member for Bury St. Edmunds, to second the Address. All sessions, for the week or two prior to their commencement, are believed to be big with important events; and, although in affirming this much of the session of 1849, now so near at hand, we but repeat a phrase to which all politicians and newspaper readers are accustomed, we cannot but believe that this time the words are more than ordinarily true; and that the work to be commenced in Parliament this year, and already commenced by popular agitation out of doors, will be in the highest degree important. A financial agitation is one that all nations understand, and John Bull has never yet been deficient in energy or comprehension when a fiscal reform was clearly set before him. In fact, the symptoms of an earnest struggle for a sweeping reduction of expenditure are apparent everywhere; and, to some extent or other, it is certain to be successful. It may not go Mr. Cobden's length; but neither Lord John Russell nor Sir Robert Peel will find it expedient to give the question the go-by. Circumstances have already made it the one great question of the session, to which even the great and pressing question of Ireland must yield precedence.

THE National Assembly of France has been busily occupied with the important question of its own dissolution. The first debate on the motion of M. Batteau took place on Friday and Saturday last, amid a tumult of conflicting voices that scarcely allowed a word to be audible beyond the immediate vicinity of each speaker. The motion—which fixed the dissolution for the 4th, and the election of a new Chamber for the 19th of March—was agreed to by a majority of 400 to 396 votes. This decision, however, was not final; it merely sanctioned the principle; and the question was passed to the next stage—the consideration of the Standing Committees, preparatory to a report, and to the ultimate decision of the Assembly. The first of these operations took place on Monday; when the Standing Committees, by a majority of 400 against 334, reversed the previous vote. A commission of fifteen was then appointed to draw up a report, out of which number only one is in favour of the dissolution. It is believed, however, that this difficult question will not, as at one time feared, lead to any great perplexity or popular disturbance. Those who are in favour of the dissolution could not, if they were as successful as their own wishes, accomplish it before the 4th of March; and the Assembly, if left to vote the principal organic laws, as originally intended, will conclude its labours quietly and legitimately by the 15th of April. It is felt by men of all parties that it is not worth while to make any desperate struggle for so small a gain of time, the more especially as the Assembly has manifested a desire to compromise the matter by dispatching its remaining business with all possible celerity. It is aware of its own unpopularity; and the hint it has already received, that the sooner it makes an end of itself the better the country will be pleased, will, in all likelihood, have the effect of expediting its movements, and of thus accomplishing quietly an object which is highly desirable, but which, if accomplished violently, might lead to unpleasant consequences, and to never-ending recriminations, full of dangers and difficulties.

Considerable speculation has been afloat, both in London and Paris, as to the destination and object of the expedition which is said to be fitting out at Toulon. Unusual activity has prevailed at all the French naval stations during the week, but more especially at Toulon and Marseilles. The general opinion is that an expedition is intended for Civita Vecchia, and that its object is to restore to the Pope as a temporal Sovereign. The opinion is, to some extent, confirmed by a statement in the Presse, a semi-official journal, to the effect that the reports in circulation are premature; that the preparations are only intended to watch events; that, although there had been a question of intervention in favour of the Pope, Ministers are divided in opinion upon the subject. It seems more monstrous that the French Government should meditate anything of the kind, than that it should continue to hope that the majority in the Cabinet will scout and oppose the idea. The Emperor of Russia would be as fully justified in sending an expedition to Paris to restore the Comte de Paris or the Duke de Bordeaux, as the French would be in landing at Civita Vecchia to restore, by force of arms, a Monarch who has been driven from his throne by his people. Even supposing, too, that the interference was justifiable, where is the utility to France, to Italy, or to Europe of the re-establishment of the Papacy? But, perhaps, the expedition is merely contemplated as a means of keeping the Austrians from interference against the Roman people? In this case the policy of France would be somewhat more intelligible.

VICTORY continues to smile upon the fortunes of the House of Austria. Lombardy is quiet under the iron grip of Radetzki; Bohemia, instead of being the foe, has become the sole reliance and prop of the Empire, since the memorable days of Prague; the Austrians Proper and the democrats of Vienna have been silenced by the cannon of Windischgrätz and Jellachich; and the turn of the Hungarians to be defeated has come in due course. Pesth and Ofen (perhaps better known as Buda), both defended by Kossuth, the Hungarian leader, were taken on the 5th—the former by Windischgrätz, and the latter by Jellachich. The Austrian army had previously passed the Danube on the ice, and captured the fortress of Raab; and Komorn is the only town that is now in the position of making any resistance. General Kossuth has withdrawn to a place called Debrezin, to effect a juncture with General Bem, the hero of the Viennese, who succeeded, after the reduction of Vienna, in escaping the fate of the Deputy Blum, and in throwing himself into the arms of the Hungarians. Kossuth has taken with him the Royal crown of the Hungarians. The name of the Magyars may be considered, for the present, at least, as hopeless. It remains for the sword to settle the young Emperor and his military advisers will be as successful in governing as in conquering. It is a comparatively easy task to subdue discontented populations by force of arms. The difficulty is to govern them after they have been subdued; and this is the difficulty that remains to subjugated Lombardy, in terror-smitten Austria Proper, in ambitious Bohemia, and in dispirited and discontented Hungary. The financial involvements of the Austrian Empire will not permit the long-continued maintenance of such armies as she now keeps in the field against her own people; and sooner or later her statesmen must exert the powers of their minds upon civil government, the diminution of warlike expenditure, and the social well-being of the people. If they do not, the same dreadful game will have to be played over again—possibly with different results upon the fortunes of the House of Este.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

METROPOLITAN COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.—At a meeting of the Commissioners, on Tuesday, Mr. E. Chadwick, in relation to the state of Tooting, moved that a committee be appointed to view the encroachments in regard to damming up the sewers at Tooting, and, if they see fit, to order them to be abated. A report from Mr. H. Austin was read, on the defective state of the drainage at the new Palace of Westminster. In this it was stated that a sewer of the first class is passing forth from the buildings, from one end to the other malaria evaporating from a surface of foul matter of between 2000 and 3000 square feet in extent. The foul matter, throughout its whole extent, presents an evaporative surface for the exhalation of noxious effluvia equal to 150 cesspools A long reply from Mr. Barry to the report was read, and commenced by asserting, "In the first place, that the drainage was devised and commenced in accordance with the rules and regulations of the late Commission of Sewers for Westminster." The report and reply having been received and ordered to be printed and circulated, the court adjourned.

STATE OF THE SERPENTINE.—On Tuesday evening a meeting was held at the Cadogan Institute, Sloane-street, Chelsea, for the purpose of calling public attention to the present filthy state of the Serpentine, and the injury inflicted by it on the population around. The chair was taken by Dr. Copland, who observed to the meeting that he had seen many of the pestilential rivers on the coast of Africa, but he had met with none the waters of which were so impure and confined animal and vegetable matter in such large quantities as the Serpentine. All that was required was a tropical heat, to generate disease in its most fatal form; and, even in this climate, the effect of such a large body of filthy water must be inadmissibly destructive. The meeting was then addressed by Doctors Pettigrew, Gooldin, Lankester, and Wilson. These gentlemen stated that on the bottom of the river was covered to a considerable depth with a thick black mud, and the waters were impregnated very strongly with sulphur and ammonia, the two ingredients most predominant in filthy drains and cesspools. Bathing in such a fluid must be not only prejudicial but also dangerous, and even rowing ought not to be indulged in, as the black mud was stirred by the action of the oars, and a greater quantity of noxious gas disengaged. A young nobleman was recently seized with malignant fever after rowing upon the Serpentine, and there could be no doubt that the filthy exhalations from the water had produced it. If any attempt were made to cleanse the river in warm weather, the consequences must necessarily be most destructive, as disease in its worst form would be generated; and therefore, if steps were not taken at once, the evil must continue till next winter. If the river were made of a uniform depth of five feet, the cost of supplying it with a continual stream of water would not exceed £1800 a year; and was that sum to be put in comparison with the health of thousands who were daily within the reach of the noxious influence of this gigantic and stagnant pool? The first resolution was then put and carried. It stated that some months ago, a petition, signed by 2000 of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Hyde-park, praying that the Serpentine might be cleansed and better supplied with malignant fever after rowing upon the Serpentine, and there could be no doubt that the filthy exhalations from the water had produced it. If any attempt were made to cleanse the river in warm weather, the consequences must necessarily be most destructive, as disease in its worst form would be generated; and therefore, if steps were not taken at once, the evil must continue till next winter. If the river were made of a uniform depth of five feet, the cost of supplying it with a continual stream of water would not exceed £1800 a year; and was that sum to be put in comparison with the health of thousands who were daily within the reach of the noxious influence of this gigantic and stagnant pool? The first resolution was then put and carried. It stated that some months ago, a petition, signed by 2000 of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Hyde-park, praying that the Serpentine might be cleansed and better supplied with pure water, had been presented to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The meeting expressed its sincere regret that the request was not complied with, as there was good reason to believe that the present state of the Serpentine was a source of serious injury to the health of those who lived near it, and urged that steps should at once be taken to comply with the prayer of the petition before the summer set in. A second resolution, appointing a deputation to wait on the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, was agreed to, and, after a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK.—The annual general meeting of the proprietors of this bank was held on Wednesday at the bank premises, when the three following directors, viz. Thomas Chapman, Esq., Edward Ellis, Esq., and H. Buckle, Esq., who went out by rotation, were re-elected, and a dividend of six per cent. was declared out of the last half-year's net profits, which amounted to £37,327 3s. After the payment of this dividend there remained the sum of £7327 3s. 1d. to be added to the surplus fund, which will then amount to £102,723 16s. 11d.

DISPENSARY FOR CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—On Wednesday the first anniversary festival of this charity was celebrated at the London Tavern. Mr. B. B. Cabbell took the chair, and, in proposing the toast of the evening, said, in explanation of the circumstances under which the institution had been founded, that the Hospital for Consumption having been removed to Brompton, it was considered desirable to establish a charity nearer the centre of the metropolis, where it could be readily attended by those unable to the sick poor who had availed themselves of the dispensary had fully justified its establishment. The report stated, that since October, 1847, 923 cases had been treated by the medical officers, while attendance had been given to 400 patients on the books.—Subscriptions were announced amounting to £178.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.

FIRE AT THE HAMPSTEAD WATER-WORKS.—On last Saturday night a fire broke out in the premises rented the Hampstead Waterworks, which was attended with a destruction of property to the amount of several thousand pounds. The premises in which the fire began were about 80 feet square, of considerable altitude, and fitted up with costly machinery, the weight of which is estimated at 30 tons. Owing to the strong cold that seems to have prevailed, they travelled rapidly through the premises, and ascended so high, that, long before an engine had time to reach the place, the whole building became enveloped in flames, from which the reflection could be seen at a distance of some miles. Several engines shortly arrived; but to obtain a good supply of water it was found necessary to take the engines up a steep embankment to the reservoir from the reservoir. This necessarily occupied some time, during which the fire continued its progress, seizing upon floor after floor and everything of an ignitable character, until the whole were blazing with the greatest fierceness. It was ten o'clock—three hours after the outbreak—before the flames could be extinguished. How the fire originated is unknown: at five o'clock, when the works were closed, they appeared perfectly safe. The flames are supposed to have commenced in one of the rooms near the steam-engine. The damage is thus chiefly reported:—Buildings of engine-house and works generally consumed; supposed loss about £3000. Machinery, steam-engine, &c., destroyed; estimated loss about £5000. Total supposed loss £8000." Unfortunately the whole of the property was not insured. [illegible]

IN SPITALFIELDS, on the same (Saturday) morning, shortly before four o'clock, a fire broke out in the cabinet manufactory belonging to Messrs. M. and J. Mahony, in Brown's-lane, Spitalfields. Owing to the highly inflammable character of the stock, but few minutes elapsed ere the greater portion of the factory was enveloped in flames, and it was nearly eight o'clock before the fire was wholly extinguished, and not until the factory of Messrs. Mahony was burned down. Jireh Chapel, accidentally escaped the general wreck; and the adjoining workshops of Mr. Ogors much burned. The sufferers were insured in the West of England Fire Office. The cause of the outbreak could not be learned.

IN BROADWAY, DEPTFORD, another fire occurred nearly at the same time. It commenced in the large range of premises belonging to Mr. Watts, a linendraper and silkmercer, carrying on business at No. 19, in the Broadway. The building, which was of considerable magnitude, was wholly occupied with the stock-in-trade, furniture, and other effects. The upper part of Mr. Cousen's premises, adjoining, was destroyed; the front and roof of Mr. Hanley's house so heavily damaged by fire and water, and the stock in trade materially injured. Mr. Watts was insured in the Norwich Union Office. The origin of the fire, like the preceding, is unknown.

WESTMINSTER IMPROVEMENTS.—On Wednesday, the commissioners for carrying out the proposed improvements in Westminster obtained possession of the whole of the houses between Pye-street, Peer-street, and the Broadway and Artillery-row, Strutton-ground, Westminster, the whole of which will be now evacuated, and will be pulled down forthwith, for the formation of the new opening to Tothill-fields, to be called Victoria-street. The commissioners have already removed the Westminster School of Medicine and the Royal Maternity Hospital, in Dean-street, and a great many houses in Tothill-street, to make the proposed line of street through Queen-square into that in James's-park, to facilitate the Royal progress between Buckingham Palace and the New Palace of Westminster.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—On and after the 15th inst., the British rate of postage of 6d. the half-ounce on letters from the United Kingdom addressed to Oldenburg, and conveyed by the direct Hamburg packets, or by private ship direct from London or Hull to Bremen, will be combined with 3d., the rate due at Oldenburg, which includes the transit-rate payable to Bremen. This combined rate of 9d. the half-ounce, &c., may either be paid in advance or left unpaid, at the option of the sender; but the payment of the British rate only, according to the existing practice, will not be permitted.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS, &c.—The deaths in the metropolis, from all causes, during the week ending Saturday, January 13, amounted to 1448, and the births to 1421. The week's average of deaths for the winters of 7 years was 1169. In the week just ended, the deaths of males have been 748, females, 791; giving an excess of 54 of the latter. Compared with the weekly average of the last five years, the increase of female deaths is 105, and that of males 174. It will be seen that the 1448 deaths registered in the week exhibit an excess of 279 on the weekly average of five winters. It is ascribed to a great extent by the sudden increase of mortality from bronchitis and inflammation of the lungs, the deaths from which were 279; those of the former weeks having been 170, while the average is 181. But the excess is principally due to zymotic or epidemic diseases, the deaths enumerated in this class were 407, and amount to nearly double the average. Scarlatina, which is on the decline, was fatal to 63 persons, or double the average; whooping-cough, to 68, the average being 42; typhus, to 83, the average being 42; and cholera, to 94, though this disease, when it is not epidemic, carries off on an average less than 1 in a fortnight at this season of the year. The mortality from smallpox (21) corresponds exactly with the average from this disease. Mr. Leonard Horner, one of "Scarlatina of bad type equal in the district to which he is one of the medical officers. A family in Castle-street, Leicester-square, has lost six children out of seven—three from the term called 'cynanche maligna,' and three from measures after scarlatina. The children were of unusually habits, and the atmosphere of their apartment was intolerable from ammoniacal gas. The rest of the house, though adjoining stables, was unaffected and free from unpleasant odour." Mr. Robinson, of the Berwick-street sub-district, also mentions a family of eight persons, all living and sleeping of about ten feet by fourteen, at No. 7, Green's-court, in which three children have died of the same disease within eleven days, and a fourth was afterwards attacked.

THE STATE TRIALS. -WRIT OF ERROR.

On Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, William O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, T. B. M'Manus, and Patrick O'Donohoe, appeared at the bar of the Queen's Bench, in custody of the Governor of Richmond Bridewell, to hear the judgment of the Court on the writs of error taken on their behalf. They were conveyed, under an escort of dragoons, to the Four Courts, where bodies of police were stationed. There was no appearance of excitement outside the court, nor in it; a large number of spectators than usual presenting the only indication that anything out of the ordinary course of business was to take place. Mr. O'Brien was accompanied by his brother. There were several ladies present, who occupied places in the gallery and under the bench.

The Crown counsel and prisoners' counsel were in attendance.

The Chief Justice said that in those several cases writs of error had been brought to reverse the judgment pronounced at the special commission at Clonmel, under a commission of oyer and terminer for the county of Tipperary. The errors assigned, and which had been argued, were the same in all the cases, and he should consider them all in one order in which they had been argued at the bar. The first objection was to the caption of the indictment. It was alleged that it did not show with sufficient certainty that the commissioners of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, before whom the commission was held, had authority to hold the special commission. The caption stated that the special commission of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery was held before the two Chief Justices and Mr. Justice Moore, by virtue of a commission under the great seal directed to them and others; and it had been contended that this represented the commission, as conferring a joint authority on the three judges named and others. If that were so, the objection would be well founded; but that was not the import of the caption. It contained two averments, each independent of and distinct from the other: one, that the three Judges were nominated and appointed to hear and determine certain cases; the other, that the commission whereby they were so appointed was directed to them and others. Each of these referred to different things, and, as each stood upon record, could not be averred again, and must be taken to be proved; nor was there any reason why they should not be both in fact. A commission might be directed to several persons, and authorise them to discharge a duty jointly and as well as jointly. There was no contradiction between the two averments; and it would be against all right and reason that one of them should be used to disprove the other. Both stood in the same authority, and, therefore, they were entitled to the same credit. The caption, therefore, was not erroneous; and, as the legal depositary of those commissions, he thought it right to say that one, two, or more of the Judges were expressly authorised to act under them; and there was no ground, in fact, for the objection that the Court below had no jurisdiction. The second objection was, that it is not, and never was, high treason to levy war against the Sovereign of these realms in Ireland—an objection which he deemed wholly insupportable. The next cases of error assigned was the disallowance of the pleas put in by the prisoners. This objection he also overruled; and he undertook to pronounce his judgment upon the plea of Mr. O'Brien on the question of his right to have notice of trial served ten days before he was called upon to plead to that record; and therefore, no time should have been supplied him, with the list of witnesses for the Crown endorsed thereon, within the same ten days, before he should be called upon to plead. The laws under which the prisoner in error had been tried were still in force in Ireland; and the acts of 25th of Edward III., and the acts of 7th and 8th of William III. and of Queen Anne entitled prisoners accused of high treason to have copies of the indictment ten days before trial; but these provisions did not apply to Ireland; and the Irish acts which bore upon the question enacted that prisoners so charged were entitled to have copies of the indictment only five days before they should be called upon to plead; and therefore, on these and several other grounds, he declared that the third objection had not been sustained. The last objection was that named on the edictum, as to why the question had not been put to the prisoner, why sentence of death and execution should not be pronounced upon him, which the learned Judge also declared to be unmaintainable.

Mr. Justice Crampton expressed his concurrence in the judgment of the Chief Justice in all its parts. He owned he had some difficulty at first about the caption, but that difficulty had been removed. With regard to the pleas that had been put in, the matter set forth in them should, he thought, be decided on motion, and not made the matter of plea at all.

Mr. Justice Perrin and Mr. Justice Moore also concurred in the judgment pronounced by the Chief Justice. The former, however, was called that on one most important question he had a good deal of doubt. It was the important question of whether or not the statute of treason was to be given in England, on the other hand, whether the 57 Geo. III. extended all the provisions of the 35 Geo. III. to Ireland, including the provisions of the statute of Anne, and, if not, whether the 11 Vict. had done so. They might disagree that there should be a difference between the law in the two countries, and that what was deemed conducive to the establishment of tranquillity in one country should not be deemed so in the other; but all they had to do was to expound the law as they found it. Therefore they had come to the conclusion that the statute of Anne was not in force in Ireland, and there was only sentence for the plea. He should not go farther into the consideration of the case, but express his concurrence in the judgments of the Chief Justice.

Mr. Justice Moore begged, notwithstanding what had fallen from Mr. Justice Crampton, to express his conviction that in receiving the pleas in the court below, they had taken a proper course.

The prisoners were then removed. They bore the adverse sentence of the Court with great equanimity. A party of dragoons attended them to Bridewell.

The prisoners intend to appeal to the House of Lords, if they can obtain the necessary certificate from the Attorney-General.

MR. DUFFY'S TRIAL.—On Saturday last the Dublin Commission Court was occupied all day with the trial of traversers, who were sent by the Judges for discussion—whether final judgment should be pronounced upon the defaulters, without placing the prisoner on trial before a jury. At the close of the Attorney-General's reply to the arguments of the bar, the learned Mr. Justice Perrin intimated that the court would require some time for consideration before giving judgment. They had made inquiry with respect to the day on which the Recorder could let them have the case on, and when he would want it on Monday. He would also want it on Tuesday. But in either case he (Judge Perrin) would on that day be occupied with important business in the Court of Queen's Bench. On Wednesday the Judges were to meet, to consider some cases reserved for their decision; so that they should necessarily adjourn the court until Thursday. The prisoner was removed, and the court was accordingly adjourned to Thursday.

THE POOR-LAW MOVEMENT.—The gentry and ratepayers continue to meet in all directions (except in Ulster), to receive an immediate change in the Poor-law. In most cases they appear to be influenced by the idea that there can be no change for the worse in their condition. In general, especially where landlords preponderate, the taxation of the area and taxation to individuals' responsibility, accompanied by some kind of law of settlement with a limited retrospective operation, is the mode of amendment of the Poor-law most urgently recommended. There is, however, one exception, remarkable on account of the locality where the meeting was held—the union of Skibbereen. At a recent meeting of the landed proprietors, farmers, and others interested in that union, a report from a committee was presented, showing that the valuation of the union had fallen, since 1839, from £97,905 to £60,000, some of the best land near the town of Skibbereen being now let about fifty per cent. under the rent paid in 1842; that the population of the union is at present about 50,000; that 19,179 persons are at present receiving relief; that for their support a sum of £68,340 is required, out of the property of the union, of the present value of £60,000; and a resolution was adopted, not only to seek the aid of the Government of the Poor-law, but also to put their own shoulders to the wheel to make law and the present relief of things to be adopted. The report of the full extent of the landowners' means to able-bodied labourers, in the cultivation and improvement of the land. An estimate was submitted for consideration of the amount of the several districts amongst the class of landlords called "middlemen," whose interests in their holdings have passed away.

AT a meeting of the Cork guardians, last week, Dr. Lyons mentioned that "there are two landed proprietors in this county, one of whom has 12,000 acres of land (which had been always in cultivation) without a tenant, and another with 8000 acres in the same position."

DISTRESS AMONGST THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY.—Some of the Southern journals contain accounts of distress and privation amongst the Roman Catholic clergy. The Cork Examiner mentions instances where clergymen have been unable to obtain the actual necessaries of life. That journal says:—"One clergyman has had no better fare than boiled parsnips. It is stated that several, even of the parish priests, have already abandoned, or must soon abandon their parishes, as, did they remain in them, they must literally starve. Even in the best circumstanced parishes of this and other dioceses, parish priests are compelled to dispense with the assistance of one or more curates." The Cork Examiner suggests for their relief a "Home Propagation Fund," to be raised amongst the Roman Catholics in Ireland; in order that they should not, "by their own act, fling the clergy at the feet of any English Government, to pension and enslave them as they please."

CHOLERA.—There were some cases reported last week at Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, a village in the county of Wicklow, situated in a salubrious locality. At Belfast the epidemic is spreading gradually but certainly.

MINISTERIAL ARRANGEMENTS.—The Ministerial arrangements consequent upon the death of Lord Auckland have been completed by the appointment of the Right Honourable Francis Thornhill Baring, who has accepted the office of First Lord of the Admiralty. The negotiations which have ended in this appointment were carried on by an effort on the part of Lord John Russell to strengthen his administration by offering the department of the Admiralty to Sir James Graham, who, however saw fit to decline the offer.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—We understand that the noble and gallant Commander-in-Chief, who is staying at Strathfieldsaye, has perfectly recovered from his late indisposition.

THE Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President of the Council, has issued invitations to the Cabinet Ministers and the great officers of state of the Queen's household, to a grand dinner on the 1 d February, at Lansdowne House, to settle the civil expenditure for the present year.

THE ADDRESS.—The Address in the House of Commons will be moved by Lord Harry Vane, and seconded by Mr. Bunbury. Her Majesty will open Parliament in person.—Times.

EMIGRATION.—Mrs. Chisholm, a lady whose able efforts, both at home and at the antipodes, to promote voluntary emigration to Australia during the last seven or eight years, has been animated with so marked a spirit of humanity towards the poorer classes, has again returned to her benevolent task. In one of a series of letters which she is publishing in the Morning Chronicle, she indicates a scheme which would confer incalculable benefit on the poor emigrant. She says:—"If a society were formed, and began with a truly Samaritan principle, to aid and advise the poor but honest men, who are borne down with the difficulties of their position, in their struggles to maintain their families, and to save themselves and their children from pauperism and crime, incalculable is the blessing that would accrue therefrom to hundreds of thousands of our people—crushed fellow-creatures. Individuals could, through such a society, supply their donations to the relief of their own parishes or persons in whom they felt the greatest interest, directing also the stream of emigration, as far as their subscriptions went, to the particular colony to which they might give a preference. [illegible] feel so much the necessity of some combined effort, from the difficulties with which I see poor people surrounded. Many a life might be rescued for pleading for what is so much needed. As a preliminary step, it is my intention to make out a list of parties who may present themselves as being anxious to emigrate, and who would gladly avail themselves of a limited assistance, to be advanced to them by a society, which I hope the urgency of the case will dispose the public to support. Having, by the bounty of a few humane individuals, been enabled to open a 'Home,' for the reception of an Emigrant ship load of females, during their own passage, or assisted by others, can obtain free accommodation, they finding their own food and fire, so as to enable them to get rid of their tenements, sell their furniture, &c., and afford every facility for a limited stay. I have expressed upon me the necessity of having some room, in connexion with an office, in which the female emigrants could affix notices of the various articles they had for sale, the amount of the goods being in general too small to pay the cost of having them advertised or sold by auction. Under the patronage, however, of such a society, such goods might be profitably disposed of; or some respectable party might, perhaps, take up the subject as a matter of business. The aid which a poor man stands in need of, is a society which will encourage him by measuring his eligibility by the constructing gauge, but one that will consider his wants, his means, his endeavours, his views, and his hopes, and judge of him as to how far the colony may suit him and improve his circumstances, and not be influenced so much by the consideration how he may suit any particular party. What is required is a society that will not look to those debarring restrictions which at present stand in the way of many a poor family—a society that will view a poor family as it stands—that if they cannot give a passage to the whole at once, would help them over in ones and twos; first the fittest and strongest. This would be forming one of nature's strongest links between this and the antipodes—and by which agency a human society could assist over the last of the family. I would not have the aged parent left behind to mourn over their lonely hearth, but would have the once infantile members of the family used to cluster, to be laid in the cold grave without having one of the offspring to follow the bier."

EMIGRATION.—A VOYAGE TO AUSTRALIA.

HARK! old Ocean's tongue of thunder,
Heavily rolling, deep and loud
To the shores he hold asunder
Only for chasms of foam;
Now, upon his friendly surges,
Ever, your coarse, conveys
All the sons of [illegible]
To a new [illegible]

THE tide of Emigration has unquestionably set in towards Australia, notwithstanding the gold of California may lead to a temporary diversion in favour of that country. We are persuaded, therefore, that the accompanying pictures will possess considerable interest at the present moment, over and above their artistic merit, which is of no common order. They, however, combine the actualities of experience with pictorial ability in a remarkable degree. The draughtsman of these scenes from Hell on board an Emigrant ship bound to Australia is Mr. T. Sumner Prout, who has visited that country, and profited by some considerable exploration of its natural beauties, as it scenes for his clever pencil. Upon his voyage, he drew the artists episodes which an emigrant ship constantly presentas great to the experienced sea-going observer. In these Sketches, then, we have no artistic invention; they are pictures of what the draughtsman saw daily, and here presents to us with truly vivid effect. These pictures are, indeed, illustrations of the author's own diary, which must, therefore, be the best accompaniment to them

TIME was, when a voyage to the Antipodes was considered a very serious undertaking; when even experienced, and wealthy ocean seamen, bound to those distant regions, took their last look of dear old England, with anxious fears and doubts of the perils and dangers to be encountered, which were then considered to be inseparable from a long voyage; and how justified in once was, as we find by the following paragraph from 'Collins's New South Wales.' The Colony, says he, of the arrival of the first fleet at Port Jackson, New South Wales, says:—"Thus, under the blessing of God, was happily completed, in eight months and one week, a voyage, which, before it was undertaken, the mind nearly despaired to contemplate, and of which it was impossible to reflect, without some apprehension as to its termination." In the present day, however, a voyage to Australia is so well understood by navigators, and generally speaking known to be so safe, that it has become divested of its once attendant horror; and the four months' sojourn on the ocean (the average time occupied in the voyage), to most persons, passes pleasantly enough. 'Tis true there are inconveniences to be experienced; and, from the circumstance of persons of different habits and feelings being thrown and kept together, little disagreements will occasionally occur: these are amusing enough, and serve to vary the usual monotony of a sea life. There more particularly allude to passengerships: in emigrant vessels there is no lack of variety; the necessary duties to be attended to for the preservation of order and cleanliness among the emigrants afford them some daily occupation, and render them more alive to those little recreations, which are frequently indulged in, and in fact encouraged by the officers of the ship. But, as a more detailed description of the manner in which the time on board is passed may be interesting. I think I cannot do better than refer to parts of a journal kept on my voyage out, and which at the same time will serve to explain the accompanying Engravings, from drawings made from sketches taken during the passage."

"Four bells. On deck. Weather thick and hazy. Wind W.N.W., and steady; ship going about seven knots. Off Madeira, distant twenty miles. Most gradually disperses, and the beautiful island is clearly discernable, capped by the last clouds of the morning.—Six bells. A general turn-out from below. Breakfast over. Emigrants on deck disperse themselves in various little groups. The schoolmaster has summoned his little class, and seated reverentially on some spars, the prescribed educational course is in full progress. A contemplative shepherd takes a solitary seat on the keel of the reversed long-boat amidships, whilst several anxious souls looking after creature comforts surround the cook's galley. Not a few are lounging over the ship's side, prying with curious eyes into the secrets of the 'deep, deep sea.' 'Portuguese men-of-war,' as Jack contemptuously calls a beautiful mollusk, common to these latitudes, pass by in hundreds, presenting to the wind their gossamer-like sails, tinted with the most beautiful pink and lilac. Flying-fish have ceased to be the 'lions:' they were on first acquaintance. They rise in shoals from the water in all directions, and after a short hurried flight, drop with an extended splash into their element again.

"The sun is now fast approaching the meridian, and some little bustle is observed on the quarter-deck. The captain, two of the mates, the doctor, and a tiny midshipman, have all adjusted their several sextants and quadrants, and are making a steady examination of the horizon immediately to the south. Gradually a long string of passengers ascend from the cabin, and curious middle-class emigrants gather in the rear of the astronomical party, who may, in fact, engaged in taking the sun's altitude, to determine our present latitude. After some minutes, the instruments are lowered within a few seconds of each other; and the Captain, solemnly addressing his first mate, says, 'Mr. Jones, make it noon.' 'Ay, ay, sir. Forrard there; strike eight bells!' This important business settled, conversation then becomes general, and turns upon what nothing the ship has made in the course of the last 24 hours. For the next hour, many and anxious too are the enquiries at the cook's galley; whilst the ship's company gather round a huge tub, with like devotion, narrowly inspecting, in the first place, the steward's integrity as regards mixing the grog; and, in the next, disposing of their allowances, each in his own way—some making short work of it upon the spot; others, in cans or bottles, carrying it away to reserve for future enjoyment.—Two bells. Dinner is now announced, and the hatchways fore and aft are pouring out a stream of hungry mortals. It is pea-soup day, and the cook, almost lost in the dense and savoury atmosphere of steam which rises from the coppers, is ministering to the creature wants of the attendant crowd, who, with hook-pot or pannikin in hand, are patiently waiting their turn. According to the rules and arrangements of the ship, the emigrants are divided into lots, or messes, of six or eight persons in each; and, except in the varying nature of the provisions, the incidents of the daily dinner on board partake very much of the same character. Sometimes, however, the forecastle (or fox'cle, as it is always called), an elevated platform in the bows of the vessel, is chosen for a select dinner-party, who, in the fresh, open air, enjoy their meal in a true pic-nic style. Tobacco is now the order of the day—the silent indulging in a pipe, the talkative enjoying a cigar—whilst all are happy. What cares, in fact, can arise upon the bosom of the wide expanse of ocean? The griefs we brought with us are forgotten, whilst all vexations have been left behind. Sleep, too, comes almost naturally to minds so situated. Thought becomes a burden where there is so little to excite it in providing for the wants of the body; therefore it is that, the pipe finished, the afternoon's nap is a retreat to which emigrants on the passage out generally retire until near tea-time, or near six bells, when the cook is again at his post—the cry of 'Tea-water!' penetrates the depths below, and soon, in noisy response, clattering hook-pans, pannikins, and pots are again rushing up the hatchways, and crowding around the galley.

DINNER IN THE FORECASTLE.

"On board the good ship the Hope, after tea, two religious services were performed, at least, [the Cat- echising] one of their party, who always read prayers; whilst to the rest of the emigrants the surgeon, as usual in such vessels, read the service of the day as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. Eight bells struck, and another transition of thought varied the proceedings of the day. Forward are preparations being made for a dance, and a musical Jack is soon found, who, seated on a coil of rope, or perched on a spar, in a very short time is plying most vigorously the fun-inspiring fiddle. In the confined space of a ship's deck polkas and quadrilles are out of the question, though at first much affectedly fastidious disinclination is expressed against the reel and jig. But it is not long before these last reign triumphant, and delicate forms and choice spirits foot the monotonous but merry-going measure with as much enjoyment as if they moved in a minuet before hundreds of observant eyes. Now, for one moment turn our eyes from the mirth-stirred bustling scene on deck, and scan the wide solitude of the surrounding ocean lit up by a splendid moon; not a sail in sight save the white swelling canvas over our head, bending bravely before a spanking breeze that is steadily urging us on in our trackless way.

"The fineness of the night tempts all from below, when the deck becomes crowded, though all appear to enjoy themselves to the full: on the poop children are gambolling, whilst those in converse sweet, or on gossip most intent, keep up a continued promenade on the deck. Descending below, there a little group surrounds some learned friend, who has industriously worked the ship's course for the last day, and is now giving a detailed report to his companions, who all busily examine the amateur's well-thumbed chart, as if they knew a great deal about it. A little beyond, perhaps, the boatswain, from his cabin door, spins one of his long, marvellous yarns to his credulous open-mouthed neighbour on the opposite side. Further on, again, is the emigrants' quarters, the interior of which can be seen through an opening in the bulk-head. Good wives are now displaying their matronly qualities, but in most cases vainly endeavouring to calm the Baby-lonish confusion of tongues and screaming squall that, for at least one hour, prevails in the family compartment of the ship. To add to the quiet enjoyment of compelled, but resigned spectators, sundry night-capped heads of disturbed damsels, retired for the night, appear from their berths, but produce little effect by their complaining, whilst the unblaketed lower extremities of others, more calm and philosophic, may be also seen projecting from the narrow confines of their beds. But hark! Four bells is striking; 'Lights out!' is heard in various quarters; and in a few minutes, save the measured tread of the watch on deck, the rustling sails, and rippling waters on the vessel's way, not a sound is heard."

We have engraved, from the same artistic source as the preceding illustrations—two views of the exterior and interior of a Hut in Australia, which we shall very shortly present to our readers.

Decided symptoms of revived trade are reported this week from Glasgow and Edinburgh; and, being the prevalence of cholera and typhus, there are general indications over the whole country of increased employment and prosperity. At Greenock the Customs for 1848 exceeded those of 1847 by £29,501. The immediate neighbourhood of the island of Malta was visited, on the 27th and 28th ult., by a storm, the dire effects of which have, perhaps, never been equalled; and even within the proverbially safe creeks of the harbour of La Valetta, the total loss of one vessel, and very serious damage to many others, principally grain-laden, from the Black Sea, bound to ports in Great Britain and Ireland, occurred. The damage done is great. All the mole, from the Barrier to the Pinto stores, including the Custom-House, is, more or less, all broken up, like a ploughed field. The lower battery at Fort St. Angelo is almost destroyed. The Calcara mole is also much injured; and in other places there is great damage.

MUSIC.

THE FRENCH OPERA.

The opening of Mr Mitchell's elegant house is to the fashionable world what the cuckoo is to the normal one—it shows us that the winter has turned, and that we may begin once more to look forward to general life and sunshine. This year the commencement is very cheering: whilst the holidays are yet being enjoyed, and the thumps and bumps of the Clowns and Pantaloons are still echoing in the theatres, he imports a whole troupe of foreign singing-birds to charm us with their warblings all through dreary January, and floody February, and windy March, until the Operas again open, and the whirl and bustle of the season begins in real earnest.

We expect that his speculation will be very successful, more so than his French plays, for the reason that an opera appeals to a far more extended audience than a vaudeville. It is true that at the talks of a large portion of the St. James' habitues French is as much spoken as English, from the constant intermingling of the two nations in society; but with many, moving even in a comparatively high circle, it is a matter of no little difficulty to follow a vaudeville and catch its finer repartees and calembourgs, albeit they understand French "after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe." But all can enjoy a pretty air; its language is universal

We are already familiar with some of the artistes who appeared on the opening night on Monday. The charming Mademoiselle Charton, the arch Mademoiselle Lutchard, and the very effective M. Coudere have already sung in London. The remaining members of the corps, whom we shall have from time to time to specify, are well and favourably known, in France, not only as Opéra Comique, but at the leading provincial theatres. M. Charles Haussens, who conducted with so much ability when the Brussels company sang at Drury-Lane, has the direction of the orchestra; and the names of Tolbecque, Delcrix, Filet, Remusat, Lazarus, Harper, Barret, Baumann, Chipp, and many others equally well known, are sufficient to show the great care and liberality with which the instrumental department of the establishment has been organised.

On Monday evening the operas of the "Maître de Chapelle," by Paer, and the "Domino Noir," by Auber, were chosen for representations.

In the first piece, which is somewhat clipped from the original score, M. Bennee and Mdlle. Guichard performed the principal characters. The former has a good bass voice, and the latter threw considerable sprightliness into her part of the soubrette. The music is very graceful, and the half-burlesque representation of rehearsing and singing an Italian Opera remarkably well arranged and given; but Lablache and John Parry have altogether eclipsed the stars of the St. James's audience for this style of composition. The operetta, however, went off very well. But "Le Domino Noir" was the attraction; as we expect the works of Auber and Adam will continue to be more than the others mentioned in the répertoire. The opera was throughout most admirably performed. Madame Alma Thillon, as our readers may remember, has played the principal character in England with great effect; but we think she is surpassed by Mdlle. Charton. She was twice rapturously encored, and once only just escaped singing a song twice times. Her engagement at the Opéra Comique at Paris has been of the greatest service; her acting is much improved by Mdlle. Charton's flexibility; and her acting was unexceptionable. M. Coudere was the Horace, giving the music of the part with remarkable finish; and he was ably played up to by M. Chateaubin as Lord Enfield, M. Soyer as Juliens, and M. Baguet as Sir Percy. The latter gentleman has a great deal of quiet fun about him. Mdlle. Guichard and Madame Mancini played the other female characters.

The "Domino Noir" must always be a favourite opera. It has the advantage of a capital libretto, which, with all the airs omitted, would make a smart vaudeville; and the music ranks amongst the most brilliant and melodious of all Auber's compositions. It was never, we think, better interpreted than on the present occasion; and gave the most extreme satisfaction to a large audience, composed of leading members of the fashionable West-end world. "La Dame Blanche" is to be one of the next earliest representations.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

THE re-opening of the Théâtre des Italiens took place last night, at the Salle Ventadour. Signor Roncoui, of the Royal Italian Opera in London, is now the lessee; the Government has granted him, on certain conditions, the privilege for six years. His great difficulty will be to get over this season, which terminates on the 31st of March. There is no Grisi and no Mario—Mdme. Persiani has also left. There only remain Mdme. Castellan, Mdlle. Meric (the youn contralto who made such a success at Covent Garden as Rosina in the Barber), and Mdlle. Alboni. Lablache can only sing a few nights, as he has been engaged by Mr. Beale for a tour in the English provinces, with his son-in-law Thalberg. The Titan of basses must be in London to sing at Balfe's concert, at Exeter-Hall, on the 30th inst. Of men there only remains, then, Roncoui, certainly a host in himself; but a tenor and a great lyric actress are, at all events, indispensable, and these two necessaries Lablache's direction has yet to seek.

The performance last night was encouraging for the beginning. The opera was Rossini's "Cenerentola," with Alboni as the heroine; Mdme. Bellini and her pretty daughter, Mdlle. Bellini, as the cruel sisters; Ronconi as the Prince; Roncoui, Dandini; Lablache, the Father; and Arnoldi, the tutor Alidoro. In the ensemble, the opera was carefully done, although the utter failures of Berlin and Arnoldi were sad drawbacks. Alboni looked well, and was in good voice; her finale was brilliantly sung, and encored with enthusiasm. She was received with evident delight. Lablache, looking greater than ever, had a vapurous recepient in his voice in not so sure as it was, and he is compelled to make long pauses to take breath, but his acting was as racy as ever. He kept the audience in a perpetual roar, resorting to all kinds of gymnastic feats, with his colossal frame, and interlarding the recitative with scraps of French. The greatest vociferation of the evening was that of Roncoui. Finer singing I never heard. I prefer the acting of Tamburini or Ronconi, but the latter possesses the science to rise en masse, as Roncoui did frequently last night, by a sparkling trait of execution, or by an intensely impressive burst. Roncoui has genius in everything he undertakes. Let his voice be ever so much gone, his execution fail him at times, yet he is sure, by a brilliant flash in some moment, to awaken enthusiasm. His finesse in the concerted pieces was indescribably beautiful. He was much cheered on his entrance.

The house looked infinitely better than it did two months since: true, the exquisite toilettes and pretty bouquets of the olden time have not yet been exhibited, but there was more dress and more animation. Between the acts of the opera, the appearance of the apologist created some approbation; but it was an agreeable surprise, as he announced that Alboni would sing some complimentary couplets on the occasion. Alboni came forward, and sang with great spirit an occasional air, "Salut à la France," and was greatly cheered for the patriotic effus on Jules Janin's new ballet, "Le Violon du Diable" (Tartini), is fixed for Friday at the Théâtre de la Nation. The new tenor, Lepinasse, will make his début next week in Raoul, in the "Huguenots." Madame Viardot will not now appear before the 1st of February, the first week in April.

On Sunday was the first concert of the Conservatoire. Beethoven's Choral Symphony No. 9, the "Freischütz Overture," Mozart's Concerto, solo, by M. Vieuxtemps, were the instrumental pieces; and Mdlle. Grimm sang a romance by Martini Auber's "Haydée" has been produced at Vienna, with great success.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—At the third meeting, on Monday night, at the London Tavern, Beethoven's Mass in C, No. 1, and a cantata, "The Praise of Jehovah," by Weber, were performed in the first part. The cantata is scarcely known in England, and the Society, we think, did well in having it translated expressly for their own use. It had been given twice before in an interval of three years, and Monday was the third time it was heard in this country. We think that the Philharmonic Society ought to produce certain works, which consists of a great variety of movements connected by recitative. The instrumentation is very elaborate, a quantur at the end being very fine. The vocalists were Misses Fyne, Miss Messent, Messrs. Bodda, Hobbs, and Segrius. Orazio Benevoli (1616) was given in the second part, and a couple of ballads by Miss Dolby, with pleasings from Mozart's "Zauberflöte." The trio sung by Misses Fyne and Miss Dolby, with its charming accompaniments, was encored. The concert terminated with a chorus from Spohr's "Jessonda." The room was full. Mr. Dando led the band, and Mr. Westrop was the conductor, with Mr. C. Cooper at the organ

Mendelssohn, for the present, has given up his famous giving ballad entertainments in the provinces, commenced a series on Monday, at the Hanover-rooms.—At the ninth Wednesday Concert, at Exeter-Hall, the vocal performers were Misses Lanza and M. Williams, Poole, Dolby, and Mrs. A Newton; Messrs. Wh. wrath, Schönholt, and T. Williams, Master Sloman, and Mr. Reaves. Thalberg (piano) and Mr. Nicholson (flute) were the instrumentalists.—The second performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," conducted by Costa, took place on Friday night at Exeter-Hall, by the Sacred Harmonic Society.—Mr. Ellis Roberts, on Wednesday, illustrated the Music of Wales on the harp, assisted by Miss E. Isaacs.—Miss Anne Romer's third soirée musicale was given on Thursday. The 115th anniversary festival of the Madrigal Society was celebrated on Thursday night, at the Freemasons' Tavern.—The Round, Catch, and Canon Club met on Saturday; Mr Bradbury in the chair.—Mdlle. Lind will sing at Norwich on the 23d and 24th inst., and at Manchester on the 6th of February, in Mendelssohn's "Elijah."—Shilling Concerts have been commenced in Manchester, on the Exeter-Hall system.

INTERESTING DISCOVERIES.—The Pilote de la Somme, of January 9, announces the discovery, in the ancient Roman city of Ambiatus (Amiens), famous as the place of refuge of Philip VI. (of Valois) after the memorable battle of Crécy of a monetary treasure of great archæological interest. It consists of thirteen pieces of gold, in the finest state of preservation, including a crown piece of Francis I., as Duke of Brittany; a crown piece of Charles IX.; three écus au soleil of Francis I.; one écu au soleil of Louis XII., a piece of Philip II.; a florin of the same Sovereign; and four of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. The Presence, of Limoges, also states that several valuable discoveries have been brought to light in that locality by the railroad operations; they include many rich and recherché specimens of old Roman art, such as camaieux, elegant red vases, adorned with the attributes of the deities to which they were consecrated; ancient tiles, fragments of glass and marble, mineralogical curiosities, and several coins and medals of the reigns of Marcus Aurelius, Severus, Marcus Nocennius the Consul (a contemporary of Cicero), and C. Plautius Hyperus, A.U.C. 424, as well as some of the early French Kings and dignitaries.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET

The tide of public favour has set in strongly towards the Haymarket; and the [illegible] characters were well sustained, and the appearance at the fall of the curtain of the enthusiastic Mr. and Mrs. Keau and Mrs. Warner being called before the curtain to receive the renewed plaudits of the audience, which was, as we have said, a densely crowded one.

We have had an opportunity since we last wrote of seeing the famous piece, "La Propriété c'est le Vol," which is now laughing away all the [illegible] of Communists and Republican Serfs in France. Nothing can equal the delight of the audience in the hard raps at M. Proudhon and his theories, so liberally dealt out throughout the piece. The scenes in which various [illegible] insist upon furnishing the house at M. Bonnichon re-glazing his windows, re-papering his rooms, hanging pictures, and putting up chiffoniers, be [illegible] comes under the droit de travail, whether he wishes it or no, is capital, only exceeded by that of the Bourse, when money is abolish d, and bart[illegible] becomes equal The opening tableau of the Garden of Eden, with Adam, and Eve, and the serpent, is somewhat beyond our notions of propriety or morality; but a piece bouffonne, as it is termed, is by no means an unusual production in Paris.

A local piece has been produced at the Boulogne theatre, in which the various [illegible] ladies, each furnished with a head-dress of some particular object in the locality. This piece, it may be conceived, from hitting hard right and left, has given some offence to [illegible]

A dancing-master (introduced as M. Fils Pied, having been particularly annoyed, is said to have sent in a party to his [illegible] on Saturday. There was a regular French edition of our "Monte Christo" row in consequence. Not a word was heard, and the curtain fell; upon which the Prefect of Police who was in the house, addressed the audience from the boxes, and told them that, as the majority appeared to be in favour of the continuance of the pie[illegible] all who opposed it would be turned out. This a-layed the storm, and the [illegible] was allowed to proceed. A song and dance of Boulogne fishermen is an effective composition, and was loudly encored.

A piece called "Les Mys res de Londres" is playing with great effect at the Théâtre Historique. It is full of amusing mistakes and anachronisms [illegible] general one being a visit of the Queen, in their robes and big wigs, to a cellar in St. Giles's, with a policeman, to capture some evil-doers.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF VICE-CHANCERY.—(Before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce.)

THE ROYAL ETCHINGS

PRINCE ALBERT v. STRAN e.—On Tuesday the Vice-Chancellor gave judgment in this case.—His Honour having referred to the previous stages of the case, which have already appeared in our columns, said that the leading facts for the present consideration might be stated thus:—A lady and gentleman, the latter being the plaintiff, [illegible]—with a view, no doubt, to [illegible] amusement—[illegible] to time, for their private use, [illegible] from designs by themselves [illegible] their residence, partly by means of which, and partly by employing a printer in the country, they took impressions, for their own use, from the plates. The plates themselves remained in the custody of the plaintiff or of his manner, or in the custody occasionally, or rather temporarily, of Mr. Brown, the printer, for the purpose above mentioned. A few of the impressions were given by the plaintiff or his consort occasionally, but not frequently, to some of their friends. In [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] near the Ball-room was an arch, in which were tastefully introduced three ornamental lanterns of ground glass, which illumined the street. In the principal lantern was represented the arms of Sir John Gerard, and underneath the motto "Long live Sir John Gerard." The second was suggestive of prosperity to Sir John and his lady; and the third was a sentiment expressive of success to Sir John and the Lancashire Hussars.

GRAND MILITARY FETE, AT ST. HELEN'S.

THE SUPPER PAVILION.

The entrance to the Town-hall was illuminated by lamps formed into devices, which had a very pleasing effect. A company of Sir John's Lancashire Hussars were stationed at the principal entrance door, and others at various points, who relieved guard every hour.

About nine o'clock, the carriages, with the guests, began to arrive, and at this time the throng about the Town-hall was very great. Sir John Gerard was amongst the first of the arrivals, and, on his making his appearance, the hussars stationed at the Town-hall were drawn up in file. The carriages then came up with little intermission until about eleven o'clock.

The promenade through the rooms presented a very splendid scene. The greater number of the gentlemen wore military uniforms, and the dresses of the ladies were very elegant. Sir John Gerard and his amiable lady were unremitting in their attention to the guests.

The dancing commenced with the "Gerard Polka," composed for the occasion; the music played by Stubbs's Royal Harmonic Band, from Liverpool. The orchestra then struck up a country dance, which was led off by Sir John and his lady, and the whole of the company immediately joined in the festive scene. After the country dance succeeded waltzes, quadrilles, polkas, &c., until about twelve o'clock, when the company retired to the Supper-room.

The repast was very sumptuous, and well sustained Mr. Gunter's metropolitan reputation. The viands were hot; the tables were profusely furnished with the choicest fruit and wines; and it was, altogether, a first-class banquet.

Sir John Gerard and Lady Stanley led the way to the Supper-room; followed by Lord Stanley, the Earl of Sefton, Viscount Burghersh, Lord Crewe, Lord and Lady De Tabley, Lord F. Gordon Hallyburton, Lady Caroline Townley, Viscount Anson, and the general company. Sir John Gerard presided at the principal table; and at the others, Major Gerard, Lieut.-Colonel Standish, and Mr. Frederick Gerard. After ample justice had been done to the sumptuous fare, Sir John Gerard rose, and gave "The Health of the Queen," which was enthusiastically responded to.

Mr. John Wilson Patten, M.P., previous to the guests leaving the supper-table, proposed "The Health of Sir John Gerard and the Officers of the Lancashire Hussars," a toast which was hailed with rapturous applause, and most cordially drunk by the whole of the assembled guests.

The company shortly afterwards adjourned to the Ball-room, where dancing was resumed and kept up with unabated spirit until close on five o'clock the following morning, at which hour the festivities terminated.

We regret that we have not room for the entire list of the distinguished guests.

The police maintained excellent order.

The Earl of Derby, and Gen. Sir W. Warre and party, were prevented from attending owing to indisposition.

The arrangements of the fête were under the able superintendence of Mr. R. Gunter, whose taste and resources were employed with great success.

At the close of the proceedings, the non-commissioned officers and privates, who had been on duty during the night, were liberally regaled in the Supper-room.

Sir John Gerard kindly consented to allow the Town-hall, together with the supper-room, refreshment-rooms, &c., with all their decorations, to remain for exhibition till Saturday.

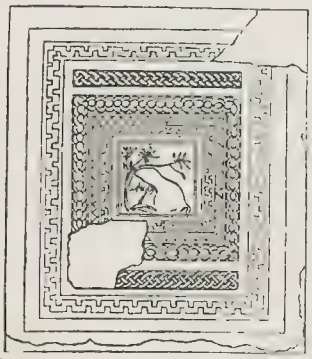
ROMAN TESSELLATED PAVEMENTS DISCOVERED IN YORKSHIRE.



ROMAN TESSELLATED PAVEMENT DISCOVERED AT ALDBOROUGH.

A VERY interesting antiquarian discovery has lately been made by Mr. H. Smith, of York, on the estate of Andrew Lawson, Esq., at Aldborough, near Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire. The curious object thus brought to light is a Roman Tessellated Pavement, perfect as when finished by the artificer; and only fourteen feet distant from another Roman pavement, also of very beautiful design, but by no means so complete as its neighbour

Aldborough, the Isu-Brigantum of the Romans, is situated upon a gentle declivity, towards the north side of the river Ure, approached by the great Roman roads, Watling-street and Ermine-street, and lies 16½ miles N.W. by N. from Ebor. Its original, or Druidic name, appears to have been Isour, probably from the goddess Isis, a deity known to the Britains.

As the chief city of the Brigantes, the most powerful people in Britain, this must have been a place of considerable importance. Its walls have been traced, and glass annulets, portions of sacrificial vessels, querns of millstone grit, and other relics have been exhumed here; and about a mile from Aldborough are the noted "Devil's Arrows," so that the whole of the locality is rife with archæological interest.

Julius Agricola, in his complete subjugation of the Brigantes [illegible], made Isu his head-quarters, and introduced among the Gaël [illegible] the arts of civilised life. [illegible] the age of Hadrian, and [illegible] among the most interesting [illegible] floors of their best apartments, [illegible] trouble, and often, [illegible]

A series of excavations was [illegible] men dug [illegible] the surface, the most perfect [illegible] in front [illegible] ther reposing under a [illegible] little except the [illegible] feet, and, as we have stated, [illegible]

In the autumn of [illegible], a [illegible] bouring orchard, [illegible] A short time since [illegible] never previously [illegible] wishing to ascertain [illegible] In this he did not succeed, [illegible] resumed in the splendid [illegible] beneath a stratum of [illegible] you uncover an [illegible] border succeeded another, [illegible] The mass of superincumbent [illegible] September last, the pavement, [illegible] perfection, lay before the explorers; and much to the gratification of the proprietor of the estate, with whose sanction the search had been made.

The Correspondent by whom we have been favoured [illegible] copy of a cleverly executed lithograph of the beautiful pavement, coloured after the original. In the margin are outline plans of Isu-Brigantum and the Roman approaches; and on the opposite side are shown the present approaches, and an outline of the pavement found in 1832, the borders of which are of beautiful design.

The coloured lithograph may be purchased for a trifling sum, in a fortnight from this time, of Mr. H. E. Smith, 3, Parliament-street, York.

Isu, the once proud capital of the Brigantes, and stronghold of the Romans during the earlier period of their occupation of the island, is now a small village of detached cottages, in its humility strangely contrasting with the historic importance of the place.

THE CHOLERA AMONG THE PAUPER CHILDREN AT TOOTING.—INQUESTS.

CHELSEA.

ON Monday afternoon, Mr. T. Wakley, M.P., Coroner for the Western Division of Middlesex, and a Jury of the inhabitants of St. Luke, Chelsea, assembled in the Board-room of Chelsea Workhouse, to inquire into the deaths of Thomas Ridgway, George Hartley, Mary Killick, Sarah Ingar, and Martha Pollington, five children removed from Mr. Drouet's establishment, at Tooting, where they had died from alleged cholera.

The proceedings excited intense interest; and on the Jury proceeding to view the bodies, which lay in the bone-house of the churchyard adjoining, several hundred persons had assembled. Mr. J. B. Ryder, the chairman, and several members of the Board of Guardians, were present.

Mr. Dronet, the proprietor of the Tooting asylum; Mr. Kite, the resident medical officer; and Mr. Popham, one of the surgeons of St. Pancras, who had been down there since the outbreak of the cholera, were in attendance.

John Killick examined: Was a labourer, and now an inmate of Chelsea Workhouse. His two children were sent to Tooting from Chelsea Workhouse about nine weeks back. They were then as healthy girls as he could wish to see. The age of the elder child was eleven years, and that of the deceased nine years. He visited them first at Tooting about six weeks back, and then was more satisfied with their appearance than when in Chelsea Workhouse. When he saw the children, he was not allowed to see them in private. The children were sent out into the lodge to see him; and the porter and other officers of the establishment were there.

By the Coroner: I did not ask to be permitted to see them privately and alone. I again saw them on my last monthly Sunday out, and, I think, asked them if they had sufficient to eat there, and they answered "No!" I took them down three allowances of pudding, which my wife had brought here, and two allowances of bread and butter; and, although the children had just had their dinner, they were so hungry that they ate the whole of it. They said they did not get enough to eat there, and they wished they were at home meaning back at the Chelsea Workhouse. I did not complain to the Chelsea guardians that my children had not enough to eat at Tooting. Had I done so, I might have met with worse treatment than I have done. When I went the second time, I found that, as well as not having had enough to eat, the younger one was eaten up with the itch. I was there last Sunday week, and then thought my children looked well; but that was the time they were dying. On the following Thursday I received notice that my child was ill; and on going to Tooting the same day I found the deceased in one of the sick wards, very poorly. I remained in the ward with her for two hours. I have been down there several times since. I saw no medical gentleman attend upon my child, or any other, all the time I was there.

Mr. Nias: Do you mean to say you never saw any?

Witness: Yes; I saw you and that gentleman (Mr. Popham), but not attending my child. I think there were about 15 children in the ward where my child was.

Mr. W. H. Popham deposed that he is a member of the Royal College of Surgeons. He had attended the deceased, George Hartley, from Tuesday week, when he was first attacked, until the time of his death on Friday morning, the 15th inst. His case presented all the usual symptoms of cholera; he died in a state of collapse.

The Coroner observed that the inquiry had now reached the point at which it would be necessary it should be adjourned. There would be two subjects into which they would have to inquire. The first was, as to how this calamity had originated; and, secondly, as to the non-separation of the children sent here to Chelsea from Tooting, which would require to be most fully gone into; and he supposed that some of the board of guardians would attend on Friday next, at one per time, be able to state the reasons which induced them to determine on continuing the children there to the present time

The inquest was then adjourned until the termination of the inquiry into the similar cases at the Free Hospital.

In reply to the Foreman of the Jury (Mr. Martin),

Mr Ryder (the Chairman of the Board of Guardians) said the reason why the Board had come to the conclusion they had adopted was, that they believed the outbreak had been caused by the excessive overcrowding of the establishment and the want of proper ventilation, and there was, after the removal of the other children, plenty of room, and plenty of nurses and medical men in attendance, which was not the case at first. The children had also now food of a superior quality; and the Board were therefore of opinion that, as they could not find any place in Chelsea in which upwards of 100 persons could be placed, it would be better to keep them where they were at present.

On the same evening, Mr. Walker also held an inquest at the Holborn Union Workhouse, on the bodies of John King, an elderly man, and James Cowderoy, aged 32, both paupers, who had died on Saturday and Sunday, of cholera. It appeared that Cowderoy, who had been but five weeks recovered from an attack of fever, was generally sent to the Free Hospital with food for the children brought from Tooting—as counsel in the case of a person so weak from recent disease, as he was more susceptible than a strong man.

A verdict of "Death from malignant cholera" was returned.

FREE HOSPITAL, GRAY'S-INN-ROAD.

On Tuesday the adjourned inquest on the bodies of the four children who died in the Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road, after their removal from Mr. Drouet's establishment, at Tooting, was resumed before Mr. Wakley, M.P. The Jury assembled as before, in the secretary's office, at the Hospital; but it being found inconveniently small, they adjourned to the Globe Tavern, in Derby-street, where the court was formally opened.

Mr Ballantine (the barrister) was present to aid Mr. Dronet with his advice in matters which he might deem essential to the administration of justice, as he considered that some erroneous impressions had been conveyed about his establishment on a previous occasion

Mr. W. R. James, Clerk to the Board of Guardians, Holborn Union, examined: I is a Solicitor, and held the office of Clerk to the Board since 1838, the year of the formation of the union. The Board of Guardians entered into an engagement with Mr. Drouet to send out the children to his establishment at 1847, and in the beginning of November in fact at year some of the boys were sent there. There was no distinct or written contract, otherwise than by letters, but they showed fully the terms of the agreement with Mr Drouet. The board kept minutes of all the proceedings on the subject, and these contained the conditions on which the children were sent. The witness here read several resolutions of the visitors from the Board of Guardians to the establishment at Tooting, which were favourable to Mr. Drouet.

The Coroner observed upon the absence of any distinct contract between the parties and Mr Drouet, and approved by the Poor-Law Commissioners. The desirability was to find where the responsibility was concentrated—whether in the Poor-Law Commissioners, the Board of Guardians, or Mr. Drouet.

The witness proceeded with the reports. That of the 9th of May, 1848, stated that the visiting guardians were at the asylum during dinner, and found the meat good, but the potatoes bad. They declared everything to be clean and comfortable in the school-rooms, dormitories, and work-rooms, but in the new sleeping-rooms for infants, on the ground-floor, they found a bad smell The girls all looked well; but observing the boys looking sickly, they were led to question them as to the supply of food, and about 40 of them held up their hands, intimating that it was insufficient. Mr. Drouet's conduct thereupon became violent. He said the boys who did so were liars that they were the worst behaved in the school; and that if he did them justice, he would follow out the suggestion of M James, and diminish the allowance of bread. Some of the boys complained of not having had enough of bread for breakfast, on which Mr. Drouet's conduct became more violent; he said that they (the visitors) were acting unfairly; that they ought to be satisfied to rely upon the statements which he had made after minute inquiry after that fashion, and that he would be glad to get rid of the children who complained. The report concluded by stating that the visitors left without completing their business. Messrs. W. Wash, Jun., Nicholson, Bullock, and W. S. Mayes. Witness was not present. On the 17th of May that report was referred by the board to a committee, including the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the board, who visited the establishment. Messrs. Wash, Nicholson, Bullock, and Mayes, and certified that they had examined the appearance and condition of the children, &c., and were able to report most favourably thereof. They inspected the bread, meat, potatoes, &c., and perfectly satisfied themselves as to the quantity and quality given to the children; in fact, they could not speak of the whole establishment otherwise than in terms of encomium and satisfaction. Regarding Mr Drouet, they stated that he expressed a great regret at the warmth of temper evinced by him in the presence of the visiting guardians.

William Wash, member of the board of guardians of the Holborn Union, was examined, and, relative to the visit of the 9th of May, mentioned above, stated: I went with the committee to Tooting; the children were at dinner. They were all standing. I believe they never sit at meals. I cut up one hundred potatoes, not one of which was fit to eat. These were served out to the boys. They were positively black and diseased. I did not speak to the children, nor did I complain in their presence. I told Drouet the potatoes were very bad. His reply was, that they had cost him £7 a ton. They had no other vegetables. On his mentioning the price, I suggested other food. He made no reply. We passed through the wards. I remarked to Mr. Drouet that the newly-erected rooms smelt unhealthy. One of the committee (Mr. Mayes) suggested that they should be a foot higher. Drouet said he should have enough to do if he listened to everybody. The sleeping-rooms looked dirty. The eyes were sunken, and looked well; the boys very sickly. We asked the boys if they had any comp int of their food, and, if they had, to hold up their hands. About thirty or forty held up their hands. I selected one boy to speak in the name of the remainder. Drouet became very violent, and said we were using him unfairly, and in an ungentlemanly manner. He called the boys liars and scoundrels, and said that the one I had selected was the worst in the school. He said his character was at stake, and if we had anything to say, that was not the way, and we ought to be satisfied with the report. (A laugh.) The result of this was that I deemed it prudent to leave off inquiry. One boy said he had a short supply of bread; when Drouet said, "You had a good dinner to-day." The boy then said, "We have had bread enough either for breakfast or dinner." I found that the printed dietary was one ounce less per meal than in the union. Witness here read the report he had drawn up, which was substantially the same as his spoken evidence.—Evidence continued: I went again on the 15th of May, when everything assumed a different aspect. The potatoes were excellent. I was surprised to find that the bread was not weighed; it was cut indiscriminately into 16 pieces. I counted the children sitting round the tables. I observed some of the boys with salt in a bag, and they were bartering it with others for their potatoes. I ascertained that no salt was supplied to the boys. I did not examine any of the children as to whether they had been punished for what they had stated on the previous day. Our report of that visit expressed that the committee were satisfied with the result of their inspection. There is a book on the board, for one set of guardians report to the succeeding party. The next set are sure to report the contrary. I did not make any formal suggestion for the improvement of the dietary; having been approved of by the Commissioners, it would have been a difficult thing to interfere with.

Richard Hall, Esq., Assistant Poor-Law Commissioner, examined.—I am now a Poor-Law Inspector. I have inspected the metropolitan district since the middle of the year 1843. I occasionally inspected Mr. Drouet's establishment, about twice in the year. I think it was not properly under the control of the Commissioners, I think their relations with such establishments are unsatisfactory.

Coroner: Then why did you go? (A laugh.)—I saw no regulations for visits, but they required information. I looked upon myself as merely an informant of the Poor-Law Board, and did not conceive I had power to make any orders. That is the opinion of the board. The system has been discussed by the board more than once, and the conclusion come to has been, that they could not issue valid orders to this or similar establishments

Coroner: Do you give this opinion, looking to the 15th and 49th section of the Reform Act?—I am not prepared to enter into a legal argument as to the construction of the act.

Coroner: We wish to have your opinion, as it is most important to the purpose of this serious inquiry that the parties truly responsible for this appalling calamity should be ascertained.—Mr. Hall, at the request of the Coroner, proceeded to read the sections in question, the tenor of which was to throw upon the commissioners the responsibility for the care of all parish poor children. The witness stated that he had considered these provisions, and continued: I have examined two establishments, those at Marlborough House and Stepney, connected with the city of London Union. I found that they had no workhouse rules. I found that rules had been issued by the Commissioners in 1845, but the Commissioners ultimately decided on not including the London union in their regulations. They have remained without the control of the board up to the present time. The Commissioners came to the conclusion that they could not regulate these institutions The Commissioners might have exercised power by prohibiting any union from sending their children there, but it would be a very strong measure. I think that, directly, the Commissioners had no power over Mr. Drouet's establishment. I deemed it my duty to visit from time to time, and report to the board. My last visit was on the 16th November. I have my report. That inspection was made in company with Mr. Tuffnell, one of the Queen's Inspectors of Schools. My visit was in consequence of Mr. Drouet having intimated to me that he intended to receive children from St. Pancras. I reported that neither his accommodation nor his supply of teachers and nurses would admit of his increasing the number of children. I recommended that he should receive pecuniary assistance towards the payment of teachers, as Mr. Aubrey had received 2 years before. I disapproved of the footing which these establishments were on, and I thought that the pecuniary assistance would bring them somewhat under control. On inspection we went through every department; but our prime object was to get more teachers. In conversation with Mr Drouet we discussed the probable expense of more teachers. Mr Drouet [illegible] to exceed to any proposition we might make

The Coroner: Then the only favour you could ask was, that he should get a portion of the public money?—For educational purposes. The Government assistance would have amounted to about £250 a year. We represented to him that his school rooms were too small. We fixed the numbers to be not more than 400 for the large school room, not more than 160 for the senior girls' school, and not more than 120 for the junior girls' school, and not more than 260 for the infant school.

The Coroner: Was that an order or an intimation? I can't say what it was. (Laughter.)

Coroner: What additional power would you have, in point of law, if you gave Mr. Drouet pecuniary assistance?—None whatever; but I think our recommendations would have been more attended to. I did not think that the atmosphere of the school was in a proper state at the time of our visit. It was too hot. I said so to Mr. Drouet

The Coroner: Did you ever expostulate with Mr. Drouet as to the crowding of his rooms? Yes; in 1846 I found that the children were sleeping three in a bed, and I expostulated with him on the subject, informing him that in the unions only two in a bed were permitted. He seemed to give the subject his attention, and to have the defect remedied. My memorandum of my visit is, "School full; 1065 in the institution; could accommodate 1100; Holborn guardians have not been sent; established, and increasing; the Board."

The Coroner: Did you examine any of the children privately? I did not, except on one point. I asked the girls whether they were kept up at night at needlework. They said they were not. Probably there was really nothing for tailoring, shoemaking, garden work, &c. I have no recollection of having examined the dietary I consider the published dietary a fair dietary, provided fair quantities are given when not specified; there is no quantity fixed for supper. I think that even during the cholera there was sufficient accommodation, provided proper arrangements were carried out. I had official authority to see any establishment in which pauper children were lodged, but no power to alter its internal management.

Coroner: Probably Mr. Drouet has fortified himself with a knowledge of the law?—I cannot say.

Coroner: Was there ever any attempt made to supersede the necessity for these establishments?—The only attempt was the proposal to establish district schools; but the outcry against them was so general, that we were forced to abandon the idea. The nature of the connexion between these establishments and the board was so unsatisfactory to the latter as it could be to the Coroner.

The day's proceedings concluded with the examination of the trades-man who supplied Mr. Drouet with potatoes, bread, &c., which went to show that the quality of the provisions was good.

The inquiry was again adjourned.

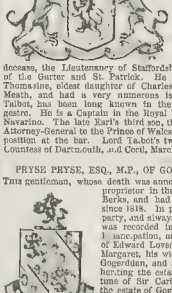
THE TOOTING PATIENTS.—Towards the close of the week favourable reports of the abatement of the epidemic were issued by the medical officers in charge of cholera cases at Tooting, at St. Pancras workhouse, and the Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road.

WE LAVE, upon the preceding page, engraved the premises at Lower Tooting, which nearly face the spot on which the road branches off to Mitcham. It appears that Mr. Drouet occupies altogether, including fields, fifty-two acres of ground, about one eighth of which is appropriated to the buildings and grounds of the Asylum. The elder girls' dormitories are in the very old family mansion facing the main road, a portion of which is occupied by Mr. Drouet and his principal officers. The boys are lodged in detached out-buildings, extending on the right or north-eastern side about half-way down, and on the opposite side the entire length of the play ground Beyond these is a range of cottages, the dormitories of the elder boys forming the extreme wing of England, the whole in the yard consist of seven distinct departments; and over these are dormitories for the younger children. The premises are flanked with ditches, mostly very full, and certainly of danger in a spot where from 1400 to 1600 children have been located, and this in the midst of a very crowded village.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

CHARLES CHETWYND, EARL TALBOT, K.G.

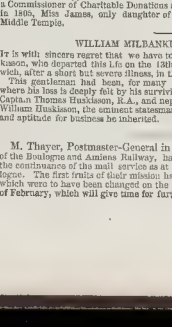
THE much-respected nobleman died at Ingestre Hall, Staffordshire, on the 10th inst, and not, as has been stated, at the family honours in 1793: and filled the dignified office of Viceroy of Ireland from 1817 to 1821. He was grandson of Lord Talbot, who derived his descent was a branch of the illustrious race of Talbot. He inherited, on the death of the Duke of Norfolk, in 1786, the title of Earl of Talbot, and the Baronies of Furnivall and Strange, and became ennobled in the person of Charles Talbot, Lord Chancellor of England, who was elevated to the peerage in 1733, as Baron Talbot of Hensol. That able and learned lawyer was grandfather of the nobleman whose death we record.



Lord Talbot held, at the period of his decease, the Lieutenancy of Staffordshire, and the Knights of the Orders of the Garter and St. Patrick. He married, 28th August, 1800, Frances Theresa Stanley, eldest daughter of Charles Lambert, Esq., of Beau Parc, county Meath, and had a very numerous issue; his eldest son, now third Earl Talbot, has been long known in the House of Commons as Viscount Ingestre. He is a Captain in the Royal Navy, and commands the Philomel at Navarino. The late Earl's third son, the Hon John Talbot, Queen's Counsel, Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales, and Recorder of Windsor, holds a high position at the bar. Lord Talbot's two daughters were Frances Charlotte, Countess of Dartmouth, and Cecil, Marchioness of Lothian.

PRYSE PRYSE, ESQ., M.P., OF GOGERDDAN, COUNTY CARDIGAN

This gentleman, whose death was announced last week, was a great landed proprietor in the counties of Cardigan, Pembroke, and Berks, and had represented the borough of Cardigan since 1818. In politics, he always acted with the Whig party, and always supported liberal measures. His vote was recorded in favour of Queen Caroline, Catholic emancipation, and the Reform Bill. Early in life he succeeded to the estates of his maternal ancestors. In the time of Sir Carbery Pryse, Bart., Gogerddan received on the estate of Gogerddan, which at that period, were not exceeded by any in the kingdom for riches, and obtained the appellation of the Welsh Peru.



The late Mr. Pryse Pryse married first, in 1798, Harriet, daughter of William, second Lord Ashbrook, and widow of the Hon. and Rev. John Thomas Agar, who died in 1813. He had no issue by her. He married, secondly, Jane, daughter of Peter Cavallier, Esq., of Glaborough, in Cleveland, and by her was father of three sons, Pryse, Edward Lewis, and John Pugh.

He served the office of High Sheriff of Cardiganshire in 1798.

THE RIGHT HON. ANTHONY RICHARD BLAKE, LL.D.

On the 10th inst. Anthony Mr. Blake died, at his residence in the Albany, in his 63rd year. He was the youngest son of the late Martin Blake, Esq., of Ballynahinch, Co. Galway; was called to the Bar in 1813; and held for twenty years (from 1823 to 1843) the important office of Chief Remembrancer of Ireland, which he was at length compelled to resign, in consequence of ill health He enjoyed, in an especial degree, the confidence of the Marquis Wellesley, when Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and was one of the earliest Catholics called to the Privy Council after the passing of the Emancipation Act. In 1831, the right hon. gentleman was appointed a Commissioner of National Education, and in 1844, a Commissioner of Charitable Bequests for Ireland. He married, in 1805, Miss James, only daughter of the late Michael James, Esq., of the Middle Temple.

WILLIAM MILBANKE HUSKISSON, ESQ

IT is with sincere regret that we have to record the death of Mr W. M. Huskisson, who departed this life on the 13th inst., at his house, Hyde-vale, Greenwich, after a short but severe illness, in the 42nd year of his age.

This gentleman had been, for many years, attached to the Foreign-office, where his loss is deeply felt by his surviving colleagues. He was son of the late Captain Thomas Huskisson, R.A., and brother and godson of the late Right Hon. William Huskisson, the eminent statesman, much of whose soundness of intellect and aptitude for business he inherited.

M. Thayer, Postmaster-General in France, and M. Lafitte, Chairman of the Boulogne and Amiens Railway, have arrived in London to negotiate for the continuance of the mail service as at present performed from Dover to Boulogne. The first traits of their mission has been that the present arrangements, which were to have been changed on the 15th inst., will be continued till the 1st of February, which will give time for further consideration.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Mutat quos mundi, naturam tollus eras:
Nec manet ulla sui similis res: cuncta migrant.

The following opinion was expressed by one whose experience of human life entitled his views to entire confidence:—"There is a large proportion of the public with whose reputation I can more than anything else; who require to have an argument obtruded on their notice many times before they can be brought to attend to it, and made familiar to them before they can fully comprehend it. It is only from the intelligent, candid, and unbiassed that an error can be at once pulled up by the roots: with the generality the process must be like that of the backwoodsman in extirpating trees, which he first fells, and then, year by year, pulls off the suckers as they spring up, till the stump dies and decays; after which he pulls it up." The means for such an end are peculiarly at the disposal of this journalist, and hence the social importance of his office. Thus, while a mention of Le Game Lawe, at this time, might be profitably proposed, he counsels the law-maker, in the words of the "melancholy Jacques," not

To fright the animals, and to kill them up
In their assigned and native dwelling-place.

The garden grounds of Norfolk, indeed, may not be surrendered to hosts of hares, and pheasants, as plentiful as pullets in a farm-yard; neither at the present day will the vault of Harrow the most appropriate place for running deer chases. But that's no reason there should be no game in the wastes and woodlands of Hampshire—neither that the chase should become obsolete in the Vale of Mowbray. It is the same with the turf. When it was made the cloak for [illegible] ing, it was fit to reiterate the danger of the practice until the evil was mitigated; that has been done at length, and now its policy demands a different course.

The disappearance of the frost has once more given a cheerful look to the cover side, and the appearance of the nominations for the great spring handicaps spirit the operations of the bookmaker. They, surely, the arrangement of these events admits of great improvement. The entries were published in the "Sheet Calendar" of the 6th inst., which also contained a notice, to the effect that the weights would be cut "as near to the 8st. as may be." Now, what can be the object of announcing the nominations two or three weeks before the handicap has been made? The duty of a handicapper is about the most difficult and ungracious that a man can be called on to discharge. He has to encounter the keenest wit, sharpened by self-interest—intent on loading him astray.

It would have made Machiavel blush had he been let into the secret of preparing a race-horse for a "dark" running. What then is Mr. Topham to do when he sees a rush in the ring to back a nomination for the Chester Cup that never shewed more promise on the turf than one of Mr. Batty's courses? He must conclude that something has been kept back, never dreamt of in his duke. A few days more will probably place this matter in a stronger point of view. In the meantime the compass of the "Sheet Calendar" of the 6th furnishes, must not be overlooked. It puts forward the "decline" of Doncaster with a form that [illegible] of that has done this: what has brought it about is known to those who have watched the progress of events for the last half-dozen years, and felt what they were surely destined to do. But this is a solitary instance There is a note of promise abroad, which will, at no distant day, mingle both grave and gay in one goodly chorus. . . . Betting during the week was all but nominal: the acceptances for handicaps will give the signal for business in earnest.

VISIT OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF MONTPENSIER TO XERES.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent with the following interesting particulars of the recent visit of their Royal Highnesses the Infanta and her augus husband the Duke of Montpensier to Xeres de la Frontera, on the 6th ult

The Duke and Duchess got up in compliment to the Royal visitors was a display of the best horses of the neighbourhood, which could be mustered. Among the animals were two black and white horses, of the breed of Zapata; a black one, of the breed of Saltan, of Carlos; another chestnut one, of Don Juan Lopez, bred by himself, a black and white, of the breed Mora; and another chestnut one, of Don M. de Bena, bred by himself The music of Leon was the sole accompaniment to the display of horses, with the awkwardness of the way by which the horses passed, and the noise of the people, frightened the animals and much annoyed the promenaders

These horses and equipages occupied a delay that looked towards the garden, whence they could behold proceeding along, as far as the space permitted, a beautiful black pony, of middling size, of the breed of Cella, which, it appears, the Town Council presented several years since to Queen Isabella for their Royal Highnesses. The exhibition being ended, their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by their attendants and the authorities, went to visit the Bodegas, or Sherry Wine Cellars of Don Pedro Domecq. The building of the bodegas was decorated with a profusion of different flags, the Spanish and French preponderating, and forming the balconies over the porch through which their Royal Highnesses were to enter. A crimson throne of velvet, adorned with gold, adorned the centre of the balcony; and under the bath were seen the two splendid carriages and the Royal Arms in gold, one of these latter having been granted by special favour by Ferdinand VII., in 1824, when he visited the said stores, in consideration of the excellence of its wines, which are considered extraordinary for their purpose in the district of Xeres de la Frontera. A large Royal Gold Crown decorated the top of the porch, and in front was placed an elegant couch covered with crimson damask. This her Serene Highness the Infanta occupied whilst the procession passed.

In order to give greater effect to the building, a beautiful balustrade had been erected on both sides, with their corresponding porches, which were kept by gallantry and courtesy. The day was as mild as spring, and about one o'clock their Royal Highnesses arrived with their suite. Senor Domecq was already in the porch to receive the Royal visitors; and he had the high honour of showing the splendid carriage of service to his sublime guests. The band of the Militant Artillery corps formed in two wings and played the Royal March, whilst more than a hundred workmen of the house gave enthusiastic vivas to the Queen, the Infanta, and her augusta consort.

On the turrets of a tower that forms part of the facade was unfurled at the moment of the arrival of the Illustrious visitors the Royal standard, amidst the music and the pealing of the great bell of the establishment; and the peals of vivas showed that this old and respectable house had prepared an ovation worthy of an Infanta of Spain.

Their Royal Highnesses passed more than an hour in inspecting the different cellars and offices of the building, and partaking the refreshment prepared for them; after which they departed, accompanied by Senor Domecq and the members of his house, and followed by a great number of workmen who never left off shouting.

In the Royal Highnesses taking leave, they repeated a thousand thanks for the attentions that had been shown to them, both from Senor Domecq having placed at the disposal of the Town-Council his magnificent carriage, with coachman, [illegible], and servants, and eight beautiful horses, and also for the cellars of which they were pleased to use, as also from the excellent reception they had met with at the country-house at his vineyards, called Macharnudo, which they visited, not less than from the extraordinary distinction with which they had been received in his Bodegas.

On their Royal Highnesses' departure the doors were shut; but the public assembled in the grounds cried out for the Infanta's genius to be again opened, and the people to be admitted to see the place and cellars prepared for the reception and refreshment of the illustrious travellers. An extensive gallery 40 or 50 yards long formed the front of the balustrade, in the centre of which was a large tent, painted white and crimson, with ornaments of silver, covered by Spanish flags, and the Royal arms. Two arm-chairs, covered with velvet, occupied the centre, before which was placed a table which was made expressly for Ferdinand VII. to breakfast on when he visited these establishments in 1824. The table was covered with a profusion of sweetmeats, ices, and creams, in silver dishes, &c. There was also a beautiful display of [illegible], and gold and silver plate. The walls were hung with damask, bearing allegorical designs of vine leaves with bunches of grapes, and the floor was carpeted with crimson Upon the balustrade which formed the gallery, and in the centre, was a collection of cut crystal bottles, all labelled, and some containing wines of 50, 80, and more than 100 years old.

There Royal Highnesses were pleased to taste different kinds of wine; and among these an Amontillado 80 years old, the wine of that called the Napoleon cask, and a Muscatel of more than 100 years old.

THE LAST OF THE OLD LONDON CONDUITS, AT DALSTON, IN THE PARISH OF HACKNEY.

PREVIOUS to the extension of habitations beyond the City walls, the natural supply of water appears to have been so fairly distributed as sufficiently to have satisfied the demands of ancient London in respect to that important article of daily use. Westward, the river of Wells, with its tributaries, the Oldborne, which rose at Holborn Bars, the Clarke's Well, and other minor streams, such as Skinner's Well, Fag's Well, Tode Well, Loder's Well, and Radwell, supplied that portion of the City with water, which Fitzstephen informs us was "sweet, wholesome, and clear."

VISIT OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF MONTPENSIER TO THE SHERRY WINE STORES OF DON PEDRO DOMECQ, AT XEREZ.—(SEE PAGE 46.)

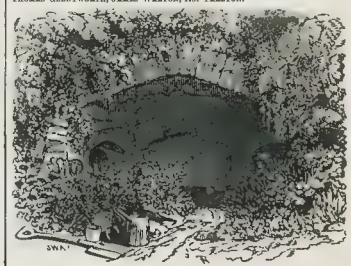
mily of the City, now covered by the buildings of Fenchurch-street, traversed the space thence to Shareborne-lane, where it fell into the Thames; while the Wallbrook, running through the midst of the City, furnished a central supply. These three streams, together with the abundant river of Thames, formed the chief sources whence the citizens of old derived their supplies of the wholesome and necessary element. In addition to them, however, various wells served to refresh their different localities; among which, were St. Giles's Well, at Cripplegate; Purlious Pool, near Moorfields; the Horse Pool, at Smithfield; and Clement's Well, in the suburbs westward.

But, in course of time, these sources became more or less impaired by the encroachment of buildings, and the change of levels for the purpose of drainage, with other consequences of an increasing population. Hence it became expedient to make much of such supplies as remained by collecting the waters of the available streams into conduits or bosses; and, moreover, by conveying into the City an additional supply from the abundance of more distant waters; while the Thames water was raised by mechanical contrivance, in order to convey it in a manner more suitable to the convenience of the citizens. As early as 1236 a patent was granted to the citizens by Gilbert Sanford, with liberty to convey water from the town of Teyborne by pipes of lead, into their city

The first great Conduit, of lead castellated with stone, was begun in Westcheap in the year 1285. This had its supply from Paddington. The Toe, in Cornhill, was built in 1401. In 1423 bosses were made at Bellingate, and at the well of St. Giles, Cripplegate; and in 1432 water was conveyed into the gaols of Newgate and Ludgate. In 1442 "Henry VI. granted to John Hatherley, Mayor, license to take up 200 fodar of lead for the building of conduits;" and in the latter part of that century, and during the 16th century, numerous other conduits were set up in different places, among which were that at Paul's Wharf, called the Little Conduit, in distinction from the larger one in Westcheap, at Aldermanbury, Fleet Bridge, another at Cripplegate, the Standard in Fleet-street, Grass-street, at Oldborne Cross, Lamb's Conduit, Stock's Market, Bishopsgate, London-wall, Lothbury, Dowgate, Aldersgate, Aldgate, &c. The latter conduit was supplied from a source which is represented in the accompanying woodcut, still existing, although in abeyance, at Dalston.

A supply of water appears to have been first brought from Hackney in the 18th year of the reign of Henry VIII., when, "notwithstanding the vast expenses the citizens of London had been at to bring water, and to erect conduits in the City, it was now by experience found that there was not near a sufficient quantity to supply the common demands. Therefore, upon application to Parliament, an act was passed, whereby the Mayor, &c., were empowered to bring water to the City from Hampstead Heath, St. Marylebone, Hackney, and Muswell-hill," &c. And in 1534, 26th Henry VIII., "two-fifteenths were granted by the Common Council of the City of London, for defraying the expense of bringing water from Hackney to Aldgate, where a convenient conduit was erected for it," &c.

The report of a committee upon a view of Dalston and Islington waters, dated 1699, describes the entire course of this supply until it reaches the Conduit at Aldgate, and likewise does "humbly certify that the said Conduit Heads of Dalston are out of repair, the first wanting two pillows for the window and opening stone, and the furthest wants one side of a stone door case and a new door, the old being broken by some persons that have broken up the inside pavement, and the curb stones round the cistern head, and taken away about three yards of a waste pipe and two leaden bosses out of the said cistern there, and the hinges and hooks of the door, and we find one of the jambs of the window is also broke, and the roof wants repair in ceiling," &c.—(Signed) THOMAS GLEXTWORTH, JAMES WALTON, &c. TARLTON.



THE DALSTON CONDUIT.

Since while the old Conduit has become more completely ruinated, and it now serves as a tool-house in the extensive nursery-grounds of Mr. Smith. Many of our readers may remember the remains of the White Conduit, of which this, among the last of their kind, has proved the survivor; and we have conceived that, as a feature of ancient London, the present view cannot fail to prove interesting to them, when the course of a projected railway shall have wholly obliterated the object itself—a thing which a few months will probably effect.

REMAINS IN NEW SQUARE, LINCOLN'S INN, AFTER THE RECENT FIRE.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN LINCOLN'S-INN.

On Sunday morning last, about half-past four o'clock, a fire broke out in New-square, Lincoln's-inn, in the basement floor of No. 3, New-square, occupied as chambers by various solicitors and barristers, two of whom only happened to sleep on the premises that night. Owing to the quantity of timber, and the walls being encased in oak, the fire spread with great rapidity. Many papers and books were saved by means of the exertions of the firemen, but these form a very small portion of those which were on the premises. The brigade men bravely attempted to carry the hose into the centre of the buildings, and had nearly accomplished their purpose, when the stone staircase fell with a frightful crash, burying everything in the way under its ruins. This event cut off all communication with the chambers above; the flames raged uncontrolled throughout the building, and the greatest fears were entertained that the whole range of buildings would be consumed. By Mr. Braidwood's directions, engines from the whole of the metropolitan stations were sent, and, on their arrival, the most complete measures were adopted for arresting the progress of the fire, which burst forth from every window with the roar as of many furnaces, and illuminated all the neighbouring objects and the sky with a red lurid glare, that was seen at a great distance. It was not until eight o'clock that apprehension was allayed. Between nine and ten o'clock several stacks of chimneys, and a portion of the front wall, having fallen, left only one, between fifty and sixty feet in height, resting upon a very slender basis, which fell in shortly before two o'clock. The fire was burning the whole of Sunday and Monday, notwithstanding several of the engines were constantly engaged in playing upon the premises, and some of the burning flakes which had been wafted by the wind upon the roof of the law chambers, No 77, Chancery-lane, having melted the gutter-plate, came in contact with the timber underneath, and fired the roof, which was discovered on Monday, and the flames were quickly subdued. Not fewer than nine fire-proof boxes were taken out of the basement of the destroyed building in New-square: they had fallen from the first floor, and, upon opening them, the deeds and other documents were found uninjured. They had reference to property of considerable value. The account-books belonging to Messrs. Jones, Bateman, and Bennett, with several drawers filled with important writings, were also rescued only tritingly injured; but a great number of tin boxes, containing legal parchments, &c., have been entirely destroyed. The present unfortunate circumstance will, probably, cause the question to be again agitated, to obtain a general registry of all deeds and mortgaged property, as is the case in Scotland, in Ireland, and most parts of the Continent. The destruction of property is variously estimated at from £15,000 to £20,000; but this is, probably, an exaggeration. Most of it was insured in the principal London fire-offices. The premises were built in 1666, immediately after the Great Fire of London, and were about 60 feet wide, of corresponding depth, and four stories high.

No. 355.—Vol. XIV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1849. [Sixpence.

THE FARMING OF PAUPER CHILDREN.

Society is too often placed in the position of the man in the proverb, who shut his stable door after his steed was stolen. When a railway accident occurs by which scores of lives are lost, all tongues and pens are employed in devising a remedy. No other subject stands a chance of being attended to for the customary period of nine days, which is allowed for all wonders. At the end of that time it drops and is no more heard of, until a fresh accident occurs to revive the interest, and lead to a new shutting of the stable door after a new horse has been stolen. The boiler of a steamboat explodes—an overcrowded boat is swamped—seventy or eighty emigrants are smothered by the thoughtless and unfeeling master of an emigrant ship—and the floodgates of spoken and written eloquence are opened in each case, and no one thinks or speaks of anything but how to shut the door against such unhappy casualties in future. Yet nothing is done. A little more care is perhaps exercised for a week or two. Society then relapses into its former indifference, and awaits a new sensation to arouse it into the same spasmodic and fruitless activity.

The "Tooting Tragedy," with the disgraceful and sickening details, of which the metropolis and the country have rung for the last fortnight, is an occurrence that has excited far more than the usual interest. It is sincerely to be hoped that the shutting of the stable door in this case will not be as temporary as in those of mere accidents and casualties, and that the public danger from the perpetuation of such a system as that which has been pursued at Tooting will lead to the total abolition of the farming of children, and the substitution of another system more in accordance with the public decency, the public safety, and the national Christianity.

Of course, there has been a searching inquiry. The death of one hundred and forty unfortunate pauper children, in consequence of disease caught in one establishment, was not an event that could occur without investigation. The secrets of the monster pest-house of Mr. Peter Drouet have been laid bare, both by the witnesses examined before the Coroner's Jury, and by the report of the medical officer appointed by the Sanatory Commission. The medical witnesses are not agreed whether the disease which swept off these wretched children was or was not Asiatic Cholera; but the testimony of all the witnesses is singularly conclusive of the fact, that, whatever the name of the disease may be, it was aggravated and rendered fatal by the personal filthiness, and the habitual insufficiency of food and clothing of the children entrusted to the care of this "farmer" of human lives, as well as by the overcrowding of the inmates in ill-ventilated and pestiferous rooms. Upon this point there can be no mistake. There may have been "foul ditches" in the immediate proximity of Mr. Drouet's establishment; there may have been "poison" in the air; the disease of which the children expired may have been "malignant Asiatic Cholera;" and each and all of these facts may tend to remove some portion of guilt from the head of Mr. Drouet and others: but, with the greatest possible allowance for this combination of evils, which, supposing them to be true, neither he, nor Boards of Guardians, nor Poor-Law inspectors could control, the facts remain, that the children confided to the care and supervision of Mr. Drouet lived in filth and semi-starvation; that they were insufficiently clad; that his establishment was unfitted for its purposes; and that, if they had been properly fed and clothed—properly cleansed from time to time—and lodged in a dwelling constructed with a due regard to comfort, decency, and health—the "foul ditches," the "atmospheric poison," and the "Asiatic cholera" would not have made such sickening and appalling havoc among them. After a long and patient enquiry, the Jury impannelled to enquire into the deaths of four of these children, belonging to the Holborn Union, have returned a verdict, in which they agreed unanimously, that Peter Drouet is guilty of manslaughter; and that the Guardians of the Holborn Union have acted most negligently in their engagement with Mr. Drouet, and in their visits to his establishment. The Jury added the expression of their regret that the Poor-Law Act is insufficient for the purposes for which it was intended; and of their hope that the time is not far distant when the necessity for such establishments as Mr. Drouet's will entirely cease.

This verdict has met with general approval; and, although we do not wish to press too hardly upon a man in Mr. Drouet's position, and although the culpable ignorance or negligence of the Boards of Guardians of the various parishes may have operated to the unhappy result as much as his cupidity or incompetency, we cannot allow the occasion to pass without expressing our satisfaction that the whole case must, in consequence of this verdict, be investigated by a still more competent and authoritative tribunal.

But whilst we have no wish either to prejudice or to screen Mr. Drouet, or other parties who may hereafter be made responsible with him for the mischief that has occurred, we must, as strictly impartial observers of the case, ask whether any man whatever could satisfactorily perform for nearly four-teen hundred children the duties undertaken by Mr. Drouet, although his intentions were the best in the world, and although he spent upon them every farthing he received from the parishes? We ask, in short, whether the ignorance of society with regard to the proper care and management of pauper children is not the primary cause of the calamity that has occurred? It is surely not enough that parishes should pay the sum of four and sixpence per week per child, or any other sum, more or less liberal, to such a man as Mr. Drouet, for feeding, clothing, lodging, superintending, and educating them. Something more than this is required. Society has not merely an interest in the physical life of the children of the poor, but a more enduring interest in their education as moral, intellectual, and religious members of a community, which boasts, and not unjustly, of being the most moral, intellectual, and religious nation in the world. If one hundred and forty poor children had not been swept off by a pestilence at a time when the public fears for its own health are more than usually excited, the fourteen hundred children confided to the care of Mr. Drouet, and the countless thousands of children in similar circumstances confided to other individuals, and to other parishes in various parts of the country, might have remained for their allotted time in these receptacles of misery, and then have been let loose upon society weakened in body, stunted in intellect, and without proper moral guidance to wage the unhappy war of poverty against wealth, and to imperil each in his own sphere the safety of society. In guarding the lives of the children of the poor, we but perform a small portion of our duty: it is proved by the Tooting tragedy that even this portion of our duty is not properly performed under existing arrangements. But far more than this is proved. It is proved that if body and soul be kept together, society is satisfied, even although under the operation of the system by which this essential duty is performed, thousands of unhappy, ignorant, and degraded beings are hastened launched into the world, to struggle against all the chances and mischances of our complex civilization.

But if Mr. Drouet's establishment had been all that the parishes which confided their children to him expected it to be—of what benefit would Mr. Drouet's establishment have been to the country? Though Mr. Drouet had been more liberal in the matter of bread and meat, and less scrupulous over his miserable "ounces" of food doled out to the children—though he had preserved them from filth and contagious disease, could he and his subordinates have given them the education and moral training, without which mere life may be a curse rather than a blessing? We must reply in the negative. It was not possible. There was no system by which this result could be obtained. A pretence of education was given—the best, probably, that the guardians desired, but the quality of which may be gathered from a fact stated in the report of Mr. Grainger, one of the medical inspectors appointed by the Sanitary Commission. Mr. Hall, the Assistant Poor-law Commissioner, informed that gentleman that in the beginning of the month of November last he and Mr. Tufnell gave Mr. Drouet a written order, limiting the number to be received in the boys' schoolroom to 400, and in the girls' schoolroom to 160. This order was given for sanitary, not for educational, purposes; but what instruction worthy of the name could have been given to 400 dirty, half-starved boys at once in an unwholesome room. The truth is that Mr. Drouet's establishment was too large, and that the whole system of the farming of pauper children ought to be abolished. Many projects have in various countries been adopted for the reclamation of juvenile offenders with more or less success; but society has yet to make trial of some project which shall prevent the children of the poor from becoming criminals in their youth or manhood.

The colony of "Mettray," which the French Government, we regret to see, is about to discontinue for want of funds, might form the model of the institutions which should supersede such establishments as that of Mr. Drouet. The Mettray, in the case of the Holborn Union children, express their hope that the time is coming when the necessity for such establishments as Mr. Drouet will entirely cease. For our own parts, we can see no necessity for such establishments in the present time, but a very great necessity for their abolition. The colony of "Mettray," though partly intended for the reclamation of juvenile offenders, and partly for children whose parents have committed offences against the law, is conducted upon principles which might advantageously be applied to the support and education of children who are neither criminal themselves, nor the offspring of criminals. Though well known in this country to the number, unhappily too few, who take a lively interest in the important subject of the education of the people, it is not so well known as it ought to be. We therefore subjoin a few particulars concerning it, which, in consequence of the disclosures about Mr. Drouet's establishment, will probably be read with more general attention at the present time than they would have commanded at any other. It needs no Act of Parliament, no interference of Parliamentary influence, to "farm" for pauper children. The various metropolitan parishes, that pay their weekly four-and-sixpences to enrich such men as Mr. Drouet, have but to unite in the establishment and support of an institution more in accordance with true charity, sound policy, and genuine Christianity, and there will be no difficulties in their way, that ordinary patience, humanity, and skill will not remove. At all events, we recommend to the perusal of the rulers and boards of Guardians the following particulars concerning "Mettray," which we extract from the "Letters to a Clergyman," published, in 1846, by Mr. Minter Morgan. They will well repay the study, and show how pauper children may not only be supported, but trained and educated to become happy and useful members of society. The colony of Mettray consists of a wide open space, inside which is a square, besides a church, a school, an infirmary, and other buildings. "The houses," says Mr. Morgan, in a subsequent visit,

> Were built by the colonists themselves, and at the expense of private individuals, whose names are inscribed upon some of them. Each house is occupied by forty boys who are denominated a family, having at the head a young man who is styled an parent, with two sous-chefs who act with him and for him in his absence, attending the boys at their meals and when retiring to their hammocks. There are also two frères aînés, whose duty it is to set a good example and give good counsel to the rest: these have a red riband tied round the right arm, and are elected every month by the boys themselves out of their own number, subject to the approbation of the directors: but their choice has invariably fallen upon those best qualified. They are elected by secret ballot, and the reason assigned for this is that the boys may become acquainted with the real sentiments of their family. The ground-floor of each house is a workshop, the first and second floors sleeping apartments. The elder boys sleep on the first floor, the younger on the second floor: with each section there is a sous-chef. The first floor is also used as a refectory, the hammocks being hung up carefully during the day, and the bars upon which they were fastened removed. There is a box for the boys' clothes just above each hammock. The boys sleep alternately with their heads towards the wall, so that they cannot converse with each other. At the end of the room is the bed of the sous chef. The directors justly consider that the parental affection and watchfulness in fine lies at the natural means appointed by Providence for promoting both private and general morality; but, as a considerable number of the colonists are the children of parents expiating their crimes in prisons, and have perhaps the means of improving their offspring by setting before them bad examples, it is necessary to form an artificial family, in which the greatest care and sympathy should be manifested towards them; so that their natural family should be remembered only as a contrast to the advantages, blessings, and friendships they are now enjoying. * * * * * *
> The right wing is an infirmary, superintended by two of the boys, under three Sisters of Charity. The left wing is devoted to a normal school, composed, of course, of a different class of young men. This is a most important part of the institution, being a training school for intelligent youths, many of whom become chefs and sous chefs of the families: without this normal school there would be great difficulty in finding a succession of young men qualified by their piety, talent, zeal, and benevolence, to discharge the interesting and sacred duties of the parent. The balcony, extending from one wing to the other, is used for exercise by the rival families, and from whence they can witness the gymnastic exercises in the grounds immediately opposite: they have also an opportunity of walking in the botanic gardens, which are in the rear of the building. There is also a large swimming-bath or pond belonging to the colony, with a convenient and ornamental island. * * * * * *

> So far as the character of the individuals who first constituted the society is concerned, the attempt has been made under circumstances the most disadvantageous; and yet in five short years it has triumphantly succeeded. And who were these individuals?—poor, neglected, and ill-reared boys, many of whom were the sons of convicts, and others who had been taken up on suspicion, and rescued from a course of certain ruin. Truly this institution richly deserves its distinction of the Paternal Colony.

This is very different from Mr. Drouet's establishment. Had we space we could quote still further; but we think we have quoted enough to prove to Mr. Wakley's jury that there is no present necessity for such pest-houses as that at Tooting.

THE BENGAL HORSE ARTILLERY.

THE Bengal Horse Artillery who played so gallant a part in the conflict in the Punjaub, detailed in a sad receding page, is on a different system from that of the Royal Horse Artillery. In the detachment plan of the latter, there are but three drivers to each gun, and additional troopers, acting as cavalry, for their defence. Every horse in the former—the Bengal Horse Artillery—has its rider, owing to the horses used in the batteries being very vicious. Each troop consists of four guns and two howitzers; some troops have 9-pounders, but the majority are composed of 6-pounders. The uniform of the men is splendid: the small Roman helmet, with its drooping tail of red horse-hair, produces a superb effect, especially when the troops are in motion. The rapidity and precision with which the evolutions are performed cannot be surpassed by any artillery in the world. In the Bengal Presidency, this branch of the service is divided into three brigades of five troops each. We are indebted for the accompanying sketch to Lieut. F. G. Atkinson, of the Bengal Engineers.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Vice-Presidency of the Republic has at length been filled up, by the appointment of M. Boulay (de la Meurthe) to that important office. According to the provisions of the New Constitution, a list of three names was given in to the National Assembly by the President, from among whom the Assembly was to choose the Vice-President. The names given were those of M. Vivien, Garnier-Baragnay D'Hilliers, and M. Boulay (de la Meurthe).

On Saturday last, at the sitting of the Assembly, the election was immediately proceeded with, and the following was the result:—

Number of votes	827
Absolute majority	414
For M. Boulay (de la Meurthe)	417
General Baraguay d'Hilliers	1
M. Vivien	827

M. Boulay was consequently proclaimed Vice-President, and took the oaths prescribed by the Constitution. The new Vice-President then delivered a short speech, thanking the Assembly for the honour conferred upon him. He declared that he did not attribute the election which called him to the high functions of the Vice-President of the Republic to any merits of his own. He saw in it nothing but a deference and a personal sympathy which he was proud to think would be the wish of the President of the Republic. He saw in it also a protest against the differences said to exist between the powers that be and the Assembly. He concluded by declaring that he would devote himself with courage and energy to the maintenance of the Republic. The speech of M. Boulay was very well received.

The salary of the Vice-President, which has not been named at 60,000 francs by a committee of the National Assembly, has been fixed by the Assembly itself at 48,000 francs.

The election suggests some observations on the constitution of Louis Napoleon's Government. It is not a little strange that it is composed almost exclusively of adherents of the Bourbon dynasty. With the exception of M. Boulay (de la Meurthe) himself, there is not a Bonapartist in any prominent position in the Government of which Louis Napoleon is the head. The civil power is in the hands of MM. Odilon Barrot and Léon Faucher, who are Orleanists. M. [illegible] is a Legitimist. The prime ministers of Louis Philippe [illegible]. The Army of the Alps has Marshal Bugeaud, the avowed incarnation of Orleanism, at its head, and its head quarters are in the very middle of France. Gen. Changarnier, a Legitimist, is not only at the head of the National Guards of Paris, but his command is a military division of which Paris is the centre, with powers so excessive as to supersede the act of the Minister of War himself. But the Bonapartists—the adherents of the actual representative of the personal friends of Louis Napoleon—are no-where to be seen. The President, nevertheless, has expressed his intention to give places of trust to many of his friends, has only succeeded in one single instance—namely, in making his uncle Jerome Governor of the Invalides. His Ministry have not modified, as his other appointments. The Prince de la Moskowa, the son of Marshal Ney, has been superseded by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, after being actually in possession of his credentials as Minister at Berlin; and the mortification to the President is the greater, from the fact that he rather pompously presented the Prince de la Moskowa with his appointment on New Year's-day, as his present. The Count de Walewski, a near relation of the Emperor, and a man who was considered by M. Guizot of sufficient importance to be sent to Buenos Ayres as Minister Plenipotentiary, was appointed at the eleventh hour to succeed Count Walsh at Madrid. Count Flahaut at Turin, but General Paiet has been appointed in his stead. Except his Aides-de-Camp, and a few of the officers of his household, Louis Napoleon has not a single adviser around him but the Ministers.

The present situation of parties appears equally adverse to a Bonapartist régime or any long-continued continuance of a Republic. With a view to exercising an overwhelming influence for the Legislative Assembly, which must take place in the course of three or four months at farthest, the Legitimists and Orleanists have patched up the differences which had so long separated them, and have agreed to a common policy and defensive alliance for their mutual benefit, having made mutual concessions to each other. There is henceforth to be no distinction between Orleanists and Legitimists. The two sections are to unite into one great party, having but one device on their banners, namely, the restoration of the Bourbons. It is agreed on the side of the Orleanists, that Henry V. shall be King during his lifetime, but that he shall adopt the Comte de Paris, who will in due time be his heir and successor. The arrangement is the more easy, because the Duke de Bordeaux has no family, and no one supposes his children will ever reign. The difficulties that arise in the event of his having progeny, either by the present or any future marriage. The feeling that mutual co-operation is necessary for success, induces all parties to sink over this and other minor difficulties. In all parts of the country section committees are in the course of being formed, composed indifferent of the adherents of the two branches of the Bourbons for the purpose of managing the elections, and they are all in communication with a central committee sitting in Paris. These are to settle the candidates to be brought forward in the different departments, to get up district committees, and in short, to manage the election in the Bourbon interest.

The question of an amnesty to the insurgents of May and June having been discussed at last in the clubs and the journals by the ultra Republicans, who charged the President with non-fulfilment of a promise in this respect, the Moniteur has published a communication, denying that any formal engagement had been entered into by the Ministers of the Republic to grant an amnesty. He had repeatedly expressed his anxious desire that such a measure were practicable, and hoped that the time would come when it could be granted without danger.

Petitions continue to arrive from the departments, praying for a dissolution of the Assembly, but without producing any satisfactory result on that body; for the committee on M. Rateau's proposition for the dissolution of the present one of the Assembly has resolved, by a majority of 8 to 4, to recommend that the order of the day be adopted on all propositions for the dissolution of the National Assembly (or, in homely phrase, to give it the go-by); which is equivalent to the report, however, that, if circumstances permit, the Assembly might dissolve in May or June next.

Advices from Vienna announce that the preparations for the expedition to Italy were discontinued. It is confidently stated that the Austrian government contemplates a measure to repress the revolutionary movement at Rome.

The Count de Chambord arrived at Venice on the 14th inst., and on the next day embarked for Genoa, in the steamer Caton, placed at his disposal by the Government.

It is said that the Prince of Canino has lately written a letter to the President of the Republic, threatening that if a French expedition were sent to re-establish Le Pape, he (the Prince of Canino) would publish documents which would compromise Prince Louis.

In the National Assembly, on Monday, the Ministerial proposition for sending the conquerors of the Emeute of June before the High National Court of Justice was carried by a majority of 406 against 248.

At a Socialist banquet, which was held in Paris on Monday, and which was attended by about 500 guests, a very great number of strangers, M. Dain, a member of the National Assembly, returning to the vote of the Assembly, and by announcing that the reactionary party was "ensnaring the Republic." "Be it so," he said, "but be calm in the presence of that reaction; beware of silly [illegible]tions; beware of descending into the streets, for the streets for you would be destruction!" This recommendation was most vehemently and universally applauded. Among the other toasts, "The speedy overthrow of the President to the cause of the Democratic and Social Republic" was drunk.

The first and third volumes of the budget for the present year were presented to the Nations Assembly on Tuesday. The first volume contains the calculations of the receipts and expenditure for the year 1849, and the budget of the Minister of Finance prepared by M. Trouve Chauvel, the late Minister. The third volume contains the budgets of the war and naval departments. The receipts for the year 1849, compared with those of the year 1848, show a diminution of 437,718,729f. The budget of expenses has been considerably reduced. The war budget presents a diminution of 76,141,850f., and the effective force of the army, which on the 1st of December last amounted to 502,96 men, and 100,432 horses, is reduced by 121,072 men and 8022 horses, so that at the conclusion of the present year it would amount to only 380,824 men and 92,410 horses, of which 76,000 men and 15,490 horses are intended for service in Algeria. The budget of marine is red ced by a sum of 22,073,029 francs. The fleet in commission is to be composed of ten sail of the line, eight frigates, eighteen corvettes, twenty-four brigs, twelve transports, and twenty-four cutters, to be manned by 20,000 men. Two ships of the line and ten frigates are to be laid disposable in the sea-ports, and ten frigates in harbour. The steam-vessels in active service are to be composed of ten frigates, twelve corvettes, and thirty-four sloops. Nine frigates, six corvettes, and six sloops are, besides, to remain in harbour.

Letters from the departments give a melancholy description of the disasters caused by the overflow of rivers in consequence of the late rains. According to the last accounts the Rhone had returned to its channel, but the Saone, the Doubs, the Yonne, the Loire and the Gisson, the Wisse and the Rhines continued to overflow and to inundate the surrounding country.

SPAIN.

Accounts this week from Madrid mention that the Minister of Marine had been attacked with apoplexy, and was not expected to survive.

The Cortes of the 10th inst. published a decree revoking all the exceptional measures adopted by the Government in virtue of the law of the 18th of March, 1848; ordering the immediate liberation of the persons who had been imprisoned or removed from their domiciles, and permitting those who had sought refuge abroad to return to Spain. Messrs. Salamanca, Escosura, Gonzaga, and other Deputies are excluded from the benefit of the amnesty.

From the seat of war in Catalonia, we learn that the head-quarters of Concha are still at Vich. On his part, Cabrera has been for the last three weeks at Amer. Each party is watching the other, but without coming to an engagement. Concha hopes to succeed with the Carlists by negotiation, but his success in this respect is very improbable. Pep del Ou has been bought, and Gomez has recently made his submission; but the chiefs really devoted still refuse all offers that are made to them. With them a new Convenio de Vegara is impossible, and Cabrera is well aware of this.

ITALIAN STATES.

LOMBARDY, PIEDMONT, AND VENICE.—From each of those States the only news that comes this week is in the shape of rumours, in which no confidence can be placed. They relate principally to the supposed intentions of Austria with regard to Northern Italy and the Roman States, and the probable renewal of hostilities between that power and Charles Albert. The Constituente Italiana, of the 16th, states that Marshal Radetzky was about to resume his head-quarters in Crema. The military hospitals and treasure chests were already en route for that place. The Venice Gazette, of the 16th, announces the formation of a new legion, which is to bear the name of Garibaldi, and is composed of the soldiers and citizens of Padua, Vincenza, and Rovigo, now at Venice, or who may hereafter join it.

ROME.—Accounts, dated the 16th, state that a report gained every day fresh confirmation, that a Spanish squadron, with 12,000 Spanish and Portuguese soldiers on board, has sailed from Spain, with the object of enabling the Pope vi et armis to regain his supremacy at Rome.

The Provisional Committee of the Government, on the 13th inst., issued the following decree:—"Every private individual, or public functionary, who shall endeavour, directly or indirectly, to prevent the convocation of the Electoral Colleges, who have been called together for the purpose of choosing representatives of the Nations Assembly, or who shall attempt to kindle civil war, or advise the people or the army to disobey the constituted authorities, is declared to be a disturber of public order, and an enemy to his country, and shall be punished with all the rigour of the law. For this purpose, a Committee of Public Safety has been established at Rome, over which the Prefect of Police will preside, which is commanded to carry the law into execution with rapidity and energy. Every provincial delegation will immediately establish a similar commission. The Ministers of Justice and of the Interior are charged with the execution of this decree."

GERMAN STATES.

HAMBURG.—On the 20th, a southerly wind and a fine missling rain suddenly set in from the sea on the Elbe afloat. The booths and tents were removed with all possible speed, but many articles had to be taken up out of the water. There were large masses of ice with considerable spaces of clear water between them, so that the lowest places the Elbe was crossed in boats.

BAVARIA.—Dates from Nuremberg to Jan. 5 state that in consequence of the sudden thaw the Pegnitz rose, at midnight, to the greatest height within the memory of man. Many houses have been greatly injured, and the people obliged to take refuge in one of the courts of justice. The police and National Guard were on hand by surprise, that they did not interfere.

SAXONY.—The Saxon Chambers were opened by the King on the 17th. In his speech his Majesty only made an insignificant allusion to the constitution of Germany. The Minister of State declared that the Government did not think right to pub. sh, without the co-operation of the Chambers, the law on fundamental rights, adopted by the Assembly at Frankfort.

FRANKFORT.—The National Assembly at Frankfort, by a majority of 258 to 211 votes, has passed the following proposition:—"That the dignity of Chief of the Empire shall be conferred on one of the reigning princes of Germany." This resolution was warmly applauded by the majority, but caused astonishment in the public tribunes. In the next sitting the National Assembly was to discuss the question whether the dignity of Chief of the Empire should be hereditary.

PRUSSIA

Our intelligence from Berlin this week is very meagre. Preparations continue to be busily made for the approaching elections. The trials of persons accused of riots and outrages during the months of June, July, and August were in progress before the Courts. In every part, those acquittals had been appealed against by the Attorney-General, had been confirmed, while various terms of imprisonment, varying from six to eigh. een months. Among them were individuals who assaulted the Ministers' residence.

There were reports prevalent of a probable change of Ministry.

M. Arago, the French Ambassador, took his final departure from Berlin on Monday. Mr Howard, the British Minister at the Prussian Embassy, having received the melancholy intelligence of the decease of his mother, has come to England, accompanied by Mrs. Howard.

AUSTRIA.

From Vienna we learn, this week, that the ice on the Danube and the Danube canal, in consequence of the sudden thaw, began to loosen during the night of the 15th, and so completely blocked up the Danube canal, that the water rushed from the canal over the banks, and the lower parts of Leopoldstadt completely under water. Many of the streets near the Danube were laid seven feet under water, the basement stories, shops, stables, and cellars were completely flooded. Several of the floating mills were shattered to pieces against the masses of ice; a raft of the chain-bridge the blocks of ice were piled up about as high as the bridge itself. Several lives were lost. One of the pillars of the large bridge on the Leopoldstadt was carried away, and injured four pillars of the railway bridge. On the night of the 16th the water previously began to sink. In the neighbourhood of the suburbs the water, when at its greatest height, reached the first story, and whole families have been plunged into ruin. In the neighbourhood between Vienna and Presburg, the ice also caused indications of a rise.

The Archduke Albert of Austria has been appointed to the command of a division of the army of Italy, and his brother William to the direction of artillery at Olmutz.

HUNGARY.

According to the 15th bulletin, published on the 15th instant by Field-Marshal Weiden, the Hungarians under Count Leiningen fled from Ofen and Pesth were eagerly pursued by the columns of the first and second corps d'armée. Colonel Count Schlaun had advanced on the 13th instant as far as Papa, whence he was to proceed to Wessprim and the town of Balcony, in order to cut off the retiring remnants of the corps of General Perczel. On the left bank of the Danube, the division of General Neustädter had an encounter with the Hungarians, near Asod, on the 13th instant, in which one officer and 15 soldiers (Colonel Gerambb was killed. One of the brigades under the command of Field-Marshal Simunich had advanced from Szegedin to Arpadbely. General Bem had proceeded towards Gaska in the hope of revolutionizing the people of that province, which had been, in consequence, declared in a state of siege.

Kossuth, in a long and enlighting proclamation, in which he declares Kossuth, the Members of the Committee of Public Defence, and all the so-called Government Commissioners, outlawed; all persons are commanded to arrest them, and deliver them to the nearest military post.

A deputation from the city of Presburg went to Olmütz to the Emperor. His Majesty received the members wit. great condescension and kindness, as being the first deputation which had come to him with terms of loyalty and submission.

UNITED STATES.

Advices from New York to the 10th instant have been received during the week, by the Royal mail steam-ship, Europa.

The most important piece of intelligence brought by the Europa is that of the satisfaction of the postal convention concluded by the British and American Governments, the effect of which was to cause the despatch of an intelligent, and responsible officer of letter bags on board the steamers, the presence of whom has greatly caused very great satisfaction in all the commercial ports of the United States.

The excitement in regard to the discovery of gold in California continues undiminished. All the accounts received, official or otherwise, confirm the statements originally made concerning the extent and purity of the deposits; and, so far as we have observed, no counter statements have been received from any quarter. Great numbers have already embarked, or are preparing to do so, for the favoured region, and among them are very many of the most enterprising, intelligent, and respectable citizens.

The political events since the last mail have not been of importance. Congress has, as yet, done little more than resume its business of general interest, its discussions having been confined to incidental and merely formal matters. A resolution has been adopted by the House of Representatives, instructing the proper committee to report a bill abolishing the slave trade in the district of Columbia. It contained a preamble, denouncing, in very strong terms, the general principle involved in slavery, and, of course, created a very considerable excitement. The Southern Members of Congress, under the leadership of Mr. Calhoun, have appointed a committee to prepare a suitable address to the people of the Southern States on this subject. It is understood that Mr. Calhoun is engaged in writing this document, and that he will put forth his utmost strength in an attempt to convince the South it has nothing to hope from the justice and forbearance of the North, and that its safety lies in being prepared and ready to maintain a separate and independent existence. It is generally considered, however, that he will not, to this appeal, be seconded by a majority of his own committee, nor can he make any impression upon the people of the South. The movement creates no anxiety, and is rather a topic of ridicule than of serious apprehension.

A bill has been some days under discussion in the United States Senate, of which the object is to establish reciprocal free trade between the United States and Canada. No action has yet been had upon it. It meets with considerable opposition, especially from the agricultural sections, and is warmly supported in other quarters. A similar bill, intended to effect the same general object, has been introduced into the Canadian Provincial Parliament.

The Secretary of the Treasury has issued an elaborate circular in regard to the appraisal of imported goods under the present system of ad valorem duties. Its purpose is to guard against fraudulent valuation.

The subject of the purchase of Cuba from Spain was under discussion in the Senate on the 5th inst., but no result was come to.

The cholera had entirely disappeared from New York, but at New Orleans it still raged with great intensity. The number of deaths there has been from fifty to eighty per day, with but little prospect of its abatement.

At Cincinnati, Louisville, and other cities of the West, the epidemic caused a considerable number of deaths daily.

In Texas, also, it had broken out amongst the troops, &c., and caused great mortality.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

By Her Majesty's ship President, 50, Vice-Admiral Dacres, we have accounts from the Cape to the 6th of December. Everything continued tranquil in the colony. The South African Commercial Advertiser states that the Queen's fort at Blaauw Fontein was completed, the guns mounted, and provisions stored for nine weeks. Reports which can be relied on are continually reaching the neighbourhood of the reform of many of the emigrant Boers to their former locations at Natal. It being generally known that the value of land there has doubled, in some instances trebled, since the promulgation of his Excellency's measures in February last, especially as immigration to that settlement being on the increase, the farmers have to find there a good market for their fat cattle and grain. Scarcely anything certain had been heard of Pretorius or the other outlawed leaders of the unhappy sense, which has added considerably for them, but no happily for their misguided countrymen. The inhabitants of Graham's Town had held a meeting to protest against Sir Harry Smith's plan for the organisation of a militia force. The loss excitement against the proposal to send convicts to the colony continued on the increase

CEYLON

By the overland mail files of Ceylon papers have been received to the 16th December.

The leader of the late revolt has pleaded guilty, and implored for mercy. Sentence of death has been recorded. His attributes the rebellion to the belief amongst the people of 32 new taxes, and states that he himself was merely made a tool of.

Earl Grey has approved of all Lord Torrington's measures, the policy which led to the revolt being advised or sanctioned by himself.

A large and respectable body of colonists have petitioned Parliament for a reduction in the imports duty on coffee, on which the imports amount at present to 200 per cent. on the value of the berry.

LABUAN.

From this new settlement we have accounts to the 9th November. The visit of commissioner Sir Thomas Cochrane Brie ks was anticipated by the arrival on October 24th, when the final arrangements for the tre ty obligations of the two nations were carried into effect. On October 24, his Excellency Governor Brooke left Labuan in the ship Bachelor, followed by the small steamer Renee. Having passed up the Brunei river the party halted near the town, and a Royal salute was fired from the Sultan's fort. Rajah Brooke and suite were accommodated with temporary lodgings erected on the site of the battery which first opened fire on the steamer Phlegethon. On the 26th, accompanied by the small number of Europeans pre-ent, and attended by his suite and a party of the Sarawak militia from Labuan, Sir James Brooke presented the Sultan with a ratified copy of the treaty with the Queen of England, enclosed within a handsome silver box; the latter was saved by his Highness with evident marks of satisfaction, but the treaty he did not take the trouble to examine. Sir James then, in the name of the Queen, informed his Highness that external friendship having been sworn between them, his Majesty had directed him to present his Highness with 3000 Spanish dollars, as a mark of respect for the free cession of the island of Labuan. Sir James then presented Pangeeran Moormein with 1000 dollars, and other sums to the members of the suite, not only to the gratification which he knew that in each case being accompanied by some appropriate remarks from the Rajah of Sarawak. The party returned to Labuan on the 31st

The accounts from Labuan itself are very satisfactory. [illegible] was received among the small number of persons on the island. The coast is singularly healthy, and Sir James Brooke has already set the example of the district by our last advices. The site selected for the town appears to be an unhappy one, being in the centre of a swampy part of which is below high-water mark. The Chinese and King Coolies had almost ignored the ground, and died of fever; and such was the scarcity of labourers that the wooden houses of the governor and others, which were constructed at Singapore, and carried over in the Bittern Shared, were not set up. The commissioner, Captain Mundy, had pitched his tent in the mud, but were about to remove to some higher ground, as fever had and nearly every one prostrate. Three more of the Marander's marines died, and every one of them were on the sick list. The admiral had ordered their immediate relief by Madras sepoys from Singapore.

NEW ZEALAND.

Her Majesty's ship Dido, 20 guns, Captain Maxwell, arrived at Portsmouth during the week, from this colony, in 81 days, the most extraordinary passage on record, bringing advices to the 6th of November.

The colony was in a thriving condition, and prosperous was widely spreading into the interior, which is evidenced by many of the chiefs wishing to live by trading, instead of by predatory incursions upon the settlers and each other.

The Governor and suite had arrived at Auckland on the 1st of October.

Colonel Wakefield, the founder of the colony, died at Wellington, in September. A Mr. Fox, a gentleman next in rank in the Company's service in the colony, had succeeded to the office of principal agent.

IRELAND.

MEETING OF IRISH MEMBERS—THE POOR-LAW.

On Tuesday, in pursuance of a circular addressed by Mr Henry Grattan, M.P., to the Irish representatives (in which he invited them to meet together and consider the most advisable course to pursue in the present distracted condition of this country), a meeting was held in the Mansion House, Dublin. It was anticipated, that, if not a majority, at least a fair proportion of the Irish members would attend in obedience to the call made upon them; but, with the exception of the few gentlemen undernamed, the Irish members treated the summons of Mr Grattan with neglect. The following gentlemen were present:—Mr. Grattan, M.P., Meath county, who presided; the Lord Mayor (Ald. O'Brien), Cashel; Ald. Fagan, Cork; Mr. Fagan, Wexford county; Mr. Scully, Tipperary county, Mr. Meagher, Waterford city; Mr. Keatinge, Waterford county; Mr. Greene, Galway county; Mr. M. George, Galway county; Mr Talbot, New Ross; Mr. Sadlier, Carlow; Colonel Dunne, Portarlington. A deputation from the committee of poor-law guardians, now sitting at the Northumberland-buildings, was introduced, and Mr Napier, on their behalf, presented the meeting with a copy of the resolutions in reference to the amendment of the Poor-law, which had been submitted to the meeting of poor-law guardians held in Dublin in December last

The chairman received the resolutions, without, however, making any promise that the meeting would be bound by them.

Some discussion of a conversational character ensued, in which Alderman O'Brien, Mr. Keatinge, Alderman Fagan, Mr. Scully, Colonel Dunne, &c., took part. The honourable gentlemen were unanimous in condemning the Poor-law in its present form, but generally approved of its principle. The exact mode of effecting amendments was, however, a matter of controversy. Mr. Scully conceived that the Irish measures should be prepared by and submitted as a finality proposition to Parliament for the amendment of the law, and thus obviate the necessity for appointing a committee, because though a committee should be appointed on the first day of the session, it might go on without concluding its labours until the summer or autumn. Colonel Dunne, on the contrary, thought that a committee would accelerate legislation on the subject. If they got a good committee, they might have a good bill before Easter. He thought that it was the quickest way to work through a committee, and he would not fee it to be consistent with his character to oppose the appointment of such a committee. There was no doubt of the failure of the Poor-law, but they should show that failure not only in Ireland, but in England.

The following resolutions were passed:—

"That, in order to give effect in Parliament to any course of proceeding that may be agreed to by this meeting, we are of opinion it is essential the Irish representatives should, except when prevented by unavoidable circumstances, attend private business, attend in their places in the House of Commons from the opening of the session to its close. That we deem it essential for the interest of this country, in the present deplorable condition, that the Irish representatives should, free from the influence of party connexion, either support or oppose the measures of Government, whether the Whigs or Tory be in power, according as such support or opposition tends to the advantage of Ireland."

The meeting adjourned to Thursday.

THE POOR-LAW.—At a large and influential meeting held last week at Monkmoor (the chief town of the county Westmeath), and attended by the representatives of all classes and parties, amongst whom were the Marquis of Westmeath, the Catholic Bishop Dr. Cantwell, Sir Percy Nugent, Mr. Tuite, M.P., &c., it was unanimously resolved: "That the amendment and reconstruction of the poor-laws were absolutely necessary; for while the burden of those laws was thrown upon the landed and agricultural interest at the moment that absolute ruin was caused to the country by legislation founded upon mistaken principles, other kinds of property exempted from the payment of the tax, such as official salaries, money in the funds, and commerce, upon land, were benefitted by the great reduction in the value of all commodities." The next resolution affirmed that the reconstruction of the law admitted of no delay, and that immediate legislation was necessary. By the third it was resolved: "That the present system of valuation under the poor-law is unjust, and is a cause of preventing improving landlords and tenants from employing the destitute, inasmuch as, by any new valuation, they will have to pay in proportion as the lands are improved, and thus it has the effect of discouraging proprietors and occupiers, who would otherwise be inclined to give employment to the able-bodied who are now a burden on the state." The fourth resolution stated that the question of adjustment between landlord and tenant having been abandoned by Parliament last session, should be settled during the next. By the last it was resolved: "That every hope held out at the period of the Union has been disappointed; that when we possessed several thriving manufactures, which have all been annihilated by the commercial jealousy of England. There remained to us but one source of income to meet the enormous tribute annually paid to England; nearly one-third of the rental of the country going there, without any return, in crown rents, the rents of absentees, and interest on loans, while a double quantity of our agricultural produce is now required to pay this tribute by the fall in prices consequent on legislation for the exclusive benefit of the manufacturers of England." A petition to Parliament, embodying these resolutions, was also agreed to nem. con. Meetings in other counties for the same object are to be held in quick succession

THE VICE REGAL COURT.—On Wednesday the Lord-Lieutenant held his first levee for [illegible]. It was very numerously attended

DEPUTY-LIEUTENANTS.—The Lord-Lieutenant has approved of Matthew Ellis Corbally, Esq., M.P., of Corbalton Hall, being appointed to the office of Deputy-Lieutenant for the county of Meath, consequent upon the appointment of the Earl of Fingal to be office of Lieutenant of that county: and has approved of Thomas Conolly, Esq., of Castletown, Celbridge, being appointed a Deputy-Lieutenant for the county of Kildare, in the room of Colonel Conolly, deceased

DUBLIN SCHOOL OF FINE ARTS.—On Saturday evening last there was a very full meeting of the Dublin Art Society, to witness the distribution by Lord Clarendon, of prizes to the several successful pupils in the School of Fine Arts. The company assembled was very brilliant. The proceedings commenced with a very lengthy lecture on beauty by the society's professor, Mr. Hogan. The successful pupils were then introduced to his Excellency, who kindly noticed the most deserving amongst them, and handed them the prizes which had been awarded. Sir William Betham then read the report of the society to his Excellency for his kindness in honouring them with his presence; upon which Lord Clarendon replied in an admirable speech, which elicited repeated applause. His Excellency stated the origin of the schools, attended to the establishment of "Schools of Design" in Ireland, which had hitherto been retarded in consequence of the Government declaring they had no funds for that purpose." His Excellency then solemnly pledged his word to effect that desirable object; and on the present occasion he stated: "My pledge has been redeemed; and, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer might, I believe, wish it had been greater truth, have last year returned the same answer of "no effects," yet effects have been found, and schools of design are about forthwith to be established, not only in Dublin, but in Belfast and Cork." (Loud applause.) And as the arrangement consequent on this determination has been confided by the Government to me, I will take this opportunity of announcing that I propose to place the Dublin School of Design in connexion with the Royal Dublin Society." On the subject his Excellency proceeded to remark:—"It is not so an unmeaning compliment that I say the Irish are, in my opinion, far more apt to learn; that they possess much greater ingenuity, and much greater natural talent than the English. And yet when I see the improvement that has taken place [illegible] England—the greater beauty of form and purity of design that I've been introduced into our various manufactures—when I think of that which may be termed the renaissance or the regeneration of English design, and when I know how much it is attributable to the schools of design, or rather, perhaps, to the acknowledgment of our deficiencies, that they lead to produce—it is not too much to expect that Ireland, although deprived of the advantage of a fair start, will not be behindhand in a race of competition, where application and ingenuity, correctness of eye and facility of hand, are indispensable to successfully mingle beauty and utility, and adapt me them to objects for which there is a constant demand or invention." (Applause.) In expatiating on the profitable ess of proficiency in design, Lord Clarendon mentioned one instance which was lately brought before the statistical Society, namely, the a manufacture of fambroid ar ornamented mantle, carried on at Belfast, and employing between 150,000 and 200,000 persons, the success of which is entirely dependent upon the novelty and practicalness of pattern; "and yet the whole of the designs are brought from Great Britain or the Continent; and I have also been informed that upwards of £60,000 are annually sent out of this country for payment of the ornaments on wrappers in which [illegible] goods are made up. (Hear.) It would be well to give encouragement in instances which open wide fields for artistic skill and ingenuity, which I am sure exist in Ireland, and merely require to be called forth, and which I trust will be extremely useful, not only to the manufacturer, but to the buyer. I have but to those who wish I still hope to see established in Ireland, natural imagery the elements of [illegible] ornament, and the genius and docile temperament to enable us to excel." [illegible] which is supposed to be the cause why Ireland is not a manufacturing country. Indeed may I am I sure of freedom [illegible]."

DEATH AMONG THE IRISH ROMAN CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.—Doctor Magauran, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry, died on Wednesday (last week), regretted by his flock, and by a large circle of his fellow-citizens of different religious and political agreement. He succeeded his brother, Dr. Bowring, late Bishop of Derry, and gave up to them his own episcopal palace. The Right Rev. Dr. Walsh, the titular Bishop of Cloyne and Ross, expired on Saturday last, after a short illness, and his remains were being conveyed to Cloyne. The deceased was deservedly esteemed by all parties for his piety, precious benevolence, and unobtrusiveness. He was, moreover, a quiet but sincere opponent of political agitation in all its various forms.

MR. DUFFY'S TRIAL.—On Tuesday, in the Court of Queen's Bench, upon the motion of the Attorney-General, the argument on the application to admit Mr. Duffy to bail was postponed to Thursday, in order to enable the learned gentleman time to read over the affidavits put in on behalf of the prisoner

GOGARTY IN ERROR v. THE QUEEN.—This case was argued on Tuesday. The prisoner had been tried, committed, and sentenced to seven years' transportation for illegally training and drilling, under the provision of the 60 Geor. 3, cap. 1. He was brought in custody before the Court. It was contended by Messrs. Fitzgibbon, Q.C., and Serjeant Smith, that the statute was bad, as it did not follow the wording of the statute, and for the Crown it was urged by Messrs. Baldwin, Q.C., and Leigh, that it was correctly formed. On Wednesday the Chief Justice pronounced the judgment of the Court. He said that the bill had framed brethren were clearly of opinion that the indictment was bad in every count, because of its omitting to specify the exact nature of the offence charged in the words of the act of Parliament; that therefore the sentence must be set aside, and the convict discharged. This decision not only procures the prisoner's liberty, but that of fifteen other parties who are under sentences of imprisonment

INCENDIARISM IN ULSTER.—GOVERNMENT INQUIRY.—Major Brownrigg, deputy inspector-general of constabulary, by direction of the Government, has proceeded to the county of Down, to hold a general investigation respecting the alarming progress of the system of incendiary fires in parts of Down and Antrim. The causes of these outrages, and the instrumentality by which they are perpetrated, are involved in mystery; and the most intelligent of the Dublin journalists have been unable to supply any reasonable explanation of the sudden outbreak of the incendiary system in districts heretofore remarkable for the tranquil conduct as well as the comfortable condition of the mass of the population. One of the chief objects of Major Brownrigg's inquiry. It is understood, is to ascertain the real circumstances of the incendiary attempt on Wednesday night (last week), upon the farm of Mr. M'Veagh, near Belfast, which was frustrated by the bravery of his two daughters, in repulsing a party of incendiaries [illegible] setting fire to the premises. There are some intelligent people in Ulster who have expressed grave doubts of the accuracy of the statements published on this subject, and who hesitate not to assert their disbelief of the conflict between the daughters of Mr. M'Veagh and the incendiaries. On the other hand, some respectable men in Belfast laud the conduct of the Misses M'Veagh. It is likely that no decided measures of repression will be undertaken by the executive, until they shall have received an account of the result of Major Brownrigg's investigation regarding the incendiary outrages in Ulster.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

ABUSES IN THE NAVY.—It is not the personnel or matériel—neither the officers and seamen, nor the hemp, tar, and timber in the dockyards and stores, that create the complaints which are now heard against the mismanagement and bankering of ships. They were constructed on some bean ideal, and when taken to sea were inefficient in some point or other. The wood then—different from the [illegible] in the steamer "Big Ben," in East Indies &c. was, "Bengilen tear," "Cut down her masts," "Give her more ballast." Iron steamers [illegible] and then it was discovered that shot would knock them to pieces like crockery-ware; ingenuity was then put to be exercised to invent fanciful tactic tricks. There being no specific remedy for a ship rocking like a cradle, when one was proved to be in that dilemma, she was sent to "sleep on her shadow" in Portchester Lake or Hamoaze. All these alterations were [illegible] as "repairs," and a pretty penny they cost. The money had out in these experiments in the last two or three years would have kept 10,000 able seamen in constant employ.—Naval and Military Gazette

PEMBROKE DOCKYARD.—The customary annual admission of boys into this dockyard has been ordered by the Lords of the Admiralty, and a number of boys have consequently been examined, prior to selection. By this annual entry the number of efficient experienced workmen in our naval establishments is kept up. The quota of drill sergeants now attached to the Pembroke dockyard battalion will be reduced on the list of April next, by the removal of five of six. The police force, it is rumoured, will also be reduced. It has been decided that the coast guard at Pembroke Dock shall country a portion of the Government offices, lately used for the accommodation of those connected with the packet service, at Hobb's Point; they will remove there in a short time

ARMY OF THE PUNJAUB.—The following is an official list of the cavalry and infantry regiments in her Majesty's service now forming part of the army under Lord Gough's personal command:—2d Light Dragoons, 5th Lancers, 14th Light Dragoons. Infantry—10th, 24th, 29th, 32nd, and 61st Foot Or, total cavalry, 2100; total infantry, 5600; 7800 officers and men

REDUCTION IN THE ARMY.—According to the Morning Chronicle, a reduction in the army is contemplated by the authorities to the amount of ten thousand men. The proposed diminution will take place chiefly in that portion of our forces now on home service.

THE SQUADRON OF EXERCISE.—Sir Charles Napier's squadron sailed from Lisbon on the 16th, steering southward.

The ship Diana, just arrived from the British port of Hong Kong, has brought, in addition to about 10,000 packages of tea, 44 boxes, two cases, and 70 other packages of china ware, 11 boxes of lacquered ware, 108 cases of confectionery, 24 cases of preserves, 90 bundles of matting, and a variety of other articles, all of Chinese produce.

TROOPS CROSSING THE RAVEE.

THE WAR IN THE PUNJAUB.

WE are enabled, by the kindness of several correspondents, to illustrate a few of the points of interest in the news just received from the Punjaub, and fully reported in adjoining pages.

THE BRIDGE OF BOATS ACROSS THE RAVEE.

WITH the accompanying Sketch, we have received the following extract from a rivate letter.—"On the 2nd of November General Cureton's cavalry and artillery crossed the Raven by the bridge of boats, a sketch of which I send you It is taken from the Lahore side of the river; and the building to the right was a favourite place of resort of Runjeet Sing. After the first attempt of the Sikhs—just before we arrived—to burn the bridge, this building was rendered tenable as a place of defence, by raising the low parapet walls to a height sufficient to cover a man when stooping. This being done in a hurry, is merely composed of mud and stones, but yet quite sufficient for the purpose. In this a company of the 50th Native Infantry and a party of the Durbar troops were placed. The latter were, however, subsequently withdrawn; as one night, on a party of Sikhs coming down, not aware of the 50th being in possession of the post, they gave them warning of our being there, which led to a precipitate retreat of the insurgents, and thus disappointed ——, who was in command, and all ready to give them a warm reception as soon as they came within range of his muskets."

In the Sketch, besides the bridge of boats, is shown a summer-house of Runjeet Sing, on the bank of the river.

The lower view, sketched by Lieut. Needham, represents a portion of her Majesty's 10th Regiment on their passage down the Ravee, in boats, a few miles above Moultan.

PERTAB CHUND

AN unsuccessful Pretender to a rich Rajahship of Bengal, who has just been arrested as the leader of an intrigue of the Sikhs, and as the head of a plot for seducing our native soldiery from their allegiance, and massacring the English inhabitants of Calcutta.

The previous career of this man is not a little remarkable. In 1835, he assumed the name of Rajah Pertab Chund, a quondam heir-apparent to the valuable zemindarry of Burdwan, who had died in 1820; he told a marvellous story of his escape from the funeral pile; alleged that he had passed fifteen years in pilgrimage, as a penance for having listened to the doctrines of Ram Mohun Roy; and succeeded, without much difficulty, in imposing upon many credulous people. In the following year, having marched, at the head of a motley rabble, into the district of Bancoorah, he was apprehended, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The year 1837 he passed in Calcutta, employed in perfecting his imposture, and strengthening himself by liberal grants of the Burdwan lands to all who were silly enough to advance him money, or otherwise aid him in his schemes. An action of ejectment was also commenced, in the Supreme Court, against the Rajah of Burdwan, but was never proceeded with, as the impostor well knew that a judicial investigation would be fatal to his plans.

In 1838 he proceeded with a large fleet of boats to a town called Calna, within the zemindarry of Burdwan. His professed object was to institute an action in the District Court of Burdwan for possession of the zemindarry, but, from some intercepted letters of his to the chiefs of the hilly districts, to the west of Burdwan, who had lately been in rebellion against the Government, it was ascertained that his real design was to employ force; and the magistrate of Burdwan, in consequence, proceeded to Calna, with two companies of sepoys, and succeeded in securing the would-be Rajah, with the greater part of his followers. No resistance was offered, but, owing to a mistake on the part of the sepoys, a volley was fired into the boats, and several of the impostor's adherents were killed and wounded. For this act, the magistrate, Mr. Ogilvy, was, at the instigation of some of the pseudo Rajah's friends, tried in the Supreme Court of Calcutta; but, as it was proved that the firing took place without his orders, he was honourably acquitted.

By this time the excitement which the claims and proceedings of the pseudo Rajah had created throughout the country became very great, and it appeared absolutely necessary to the Government that a public inquiry should take place, in order that the question of his identity might be set at rest. The investigation was entrusted to Mr. Samuells, the magistrate of Hooghly, and occupied many weeks. The interest manifested in the proceedings by all classes of the community, European and native, was, in India, unprecedented. The prisoner was defended by two of the most eminent counsel at the Calcutta bar, and the mass of evidence taken was enormous. The result was, that the prisoner was committed to the sessions to take his trial on distinct charges of personation, obtaining money under false pretences, and riotous assemblage.

THE PSEUDO RAJAH, PERTAB CHUND.

It was fully proved that the real Pertab Chund had died, and been burned in the presence of many thousand spectators; that the prisoner was not the party he professed to be; and that he was, in fact, a person of the name of Kistolole Brahmacharee, who had been in the habit of wandering over India for many years under various disguises, and practising upon the credulity of his fellow-countrymen. He was ultimately sentenced to pay a fine of 1000 rupees; and since that period, little has been heard of him, except that he was living in the bazaars of Calcutta, sunk in debauchery, and preying on the credulity of the few dupes who still adhered to him.

From the accounts which have reached us it would seem that his present escapade is likely to be his last, and that he stands every chance of ending his days on the shores of Marirahan, the Botany Bay of Bengal. His story, of which we have given a very imperfect outline, is full of romance, and worthy of more space than we have been able to devote to it.

The accompanying Sketch was taken in the Hooghly gaol, by Mr. C. Grant, a clever artist now resident in Calcutta.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF AN OFFICER OF THE BENGAL HORSE ARTILLERY.

(Dated December 1st, 1848.)

"There has been a skirmish at a place called Ramnuggur, on the river Chenaub, about forty miles north of Lahore. It was intended for a reconnaissance, but circumstances turned it into a cavalry fight, as I will endeavour to explain to you. Lord Gough, hearing that the enemy had drawn up in force on the opposite side of the river Chenaub, determined to reconnoitre them, and two fords across the river. For this purpose they detached two parties, the first consisting of the 3rd Dragoons, the 8th Light Cavalry, and a troop of Horse Artillery, to examine one ford; the second party consisted of the 14th Dragoons, 5th Light Cavalry, some irregular Cavalry, and Lieut.-Colonel Laurie's troop of Horse Artillery, to look at the other ford. The force left camp about 3 A.M., and arrived on the ground about 7 A.M. One of the parties was going along steadily, as directed, when they came across the nullah, and seeing a large number of the enemy's cavalry beyond, Colonel Havelock ordered a charge; and as the party were crossing the nullah, the enemy's guns on the opposite side opened on them, at about 300 yards range. The Sikhs had placed their guns in masked batteries; and, as you may suppose, the sudden discharge took our people by surprise: nevertheless, they went on, seeing a great number of the enemy beyond the nullah. The ground was very heavy and sandy: a large portion of our cavalry got into a quicksand, and the horses, being somewhat exhausted by the march over the heavy ground, were not able to extricate themselves as soon as they would have done. The enemy's infantry were, in the meantime, behind large sand hillocks, and steadily firing into our men, as well as from the large Sikh guns on the other side of the river. The horse artillery immediately unlimbered their guns and returned the fire as well as could be expected, from six small guns. The retreat was then sounded, and, in recrossing the nullah, one of our guns, as also two ammunition-waggons, stuck fast in the sand, the poles of the limber and the horses being shot: they had, however, previously spiked the gun, so as to render it useless to the enemy. The Commander-in-Chief, hearing the firing, had ridden up to the spot. Meantime, Colonel Havelock was about to make another charge at the enemy with the 14th Dragoons, but the Commander-in-Chief sent an order by General Cureton, who commanded the cavalry division, to prevent the charge; and, in conveying this order, the General was shot through the heart. Colonel Havelock has also fallen. Colonel Alexander, 5th Cavalry, was shot through the right arm, and has since had it taken out of the socket. Several officers of the 14th Dragoons were killed and wounded; also several officers of the 5th Light Cavalry, whose names we have not heard. The gun and ammunition-waggons were abandoned by order of Lord Gough, as the fire from the enemy's guns was very severe. The guns on the opposite side of the river, and the portion of the enemy's force drawn up behind a quicksand, has been a regular trap, into which we have fallen most woefully."

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOSEPH THACKWELL,

K.C.B., K.H., &c.

IT will be seen by the details of the intelligence from the Punjaub, in a succeeding column, that its most gratifying event is the defeat in a pitched battle, on the right bank of the Chenab, of the Sikh army, 40,000 strong, headed by Shere Sing in person, by a small force of the British troops, under 9000 strong, ably commanded by Major-General Sir Joseph Thackwell, a veteran of the Peninsular School. The enemy lost 4000 men and five guns, with Shere Singh's private elephant; whilst the loss of the British did not exceed 400 in killed and wounded. The enemy retreated during the night of December 3, and were pursued by Sir Joseph Thackwell; and, according to the latest accounts from Bombay, a report was current in Lord Gough's camp, that the gallant Major-General had come up with Shere Singh's force at Dinjah, 20 miles distant from the Chenab, where a battle had been fought. Nothing more can be known until the arrival of the next Indian Mail; but, as the Sikh army, after their defeat on December 3, had subdivided into three parties, it is not very probable that any portion of them who may evade their pursuers will remain long together, particularly as one of our allies is in their rear.

In the Daily News of the 23rd inst. we find the following outline of Sir Joseph Thackwell's services:—

"This gallant and distinguished officer entered the service of his country so far back as 1800. His first commission, as cornet in the 18th Light Dragoons, bears date 23rd April in that year; he obtained the rank of lieutenant in 1801; captain in 1807; major, 1815; brevet lieutenant-colonel, 1817; lieutenant-colonel, 1830; colonel, 1837; local rank of major-general, in India, in the same year; and in England in 1846. He served with Sir John Moore in Spain was engaged at Corunna, Vittoria (wounded), the Pyrenees, Orthez, Toulouse, and Waterloo; in the latter he lost an arm. During the above service, it appears, by the "Records of the 18th Hussars," he frequently greatly distinguished himself, and was several times specially recommended for promotion. From 1820 to 1832 he commanded the 15th Hussars, and his services were oftentimes required in quelling riots at Nottingham, Birmingham, &c. In 1837 he proceeded to India; and being promoted to the rank of major-general, held important and distinguished commands in the first Afghan campaign, the campaign in Gwalior, and on the Sutlej in 1846. He bore a conspicuous part in the actions of Ghuznee, Maharajpore, and Sobraon: in the last, his leading the cavalry with such effect against the Sikh batteries is fresh in the memory of our readers."

The accompanying Portrait is from a painting by Mr. Thomas Harrington Wilson, whom we have to thank for leave to engrave the same.

The intelligence from India, received this week by despatches in anticipation of the Overland Mail, is of more than usual interest and importance, though in some respects of a painful character. The dates are—from the army of the Punjab to the 26th of November, Calcutta the 8th of December, and Bombay to the 18th of December.

The principal feature of this intelligence is the retreat of the Sikh army under Shere Singh from the banks of the Chenab, along the mountain chain, in the direction of the Jhelum, after remaining for nearly a fortnight in the presence of our army, which, during the greater part of that period, was waiting the arrival of reinforcements.

By the accounts in the last mail Shere Singh was described as occupying a position on the right bank of the Ravee, whilst Lord Gough's camp was situate about twelve miles from Ramnuggur, on the left bank. According as our troops advanced under Lord Gough, the enemy were reported in force at several places, but always evacuated them before they were occupied by us; they were at length, however, ascertained to have determined on making a stand at Ramnuggur, and General Cureton was directed to halt until more troops came up. Brigadier-General Campbell joined his camp on the 12th, taking command as senior officer, and bringing up another brigade.

Considerable additions to the force of the camp were made during the five or six days following, and at length, the Commander-in-Chief having considered that the time had arrived for the commencement of operations, orders were issued late on the night of the 21st of November, in the camp of Brigadier-General Campbell, at Saharun, for the troops to parade on the ensuing morning, at three o'clock, in front of the centre of the camp, without sound of bugle, trumpet, or drum; and a strong detachment marched, under the personal command of the Commander-in-Chief (who had come up from the head-quarters camp to superintend the proceedings of the morning), at the appointed time, and reached the left bank of the Chenab, near Ramnuggur, at an early hour, in the hope of surprising the detachment of the enemy who were known to be on the same side. It would appear, however, that these had early intimation of the movement of the British troops, and had all retired across, except a few stragglers and a picquet, which fled, leaving their tents pitched. The object of the movement on our side was, however, mainly to ascertain the real strength and position of the enemy, and this was in some degree effected on clearing Ramnuggur towards the left bank of the river. Then it became apparent that their camp was pitched along the right bank of the river, which was seen to be crowded by thousands of men, whose white and light-coloured garments strongly contrasted with the bodies of the British troops, to which the eyes of our officers had been for some time past accustomed. In drawing out their fire, to ascertain their real strength in guns, and pressing, perhaps, rather too zealously in pursuit of those of the fugitives who appeared to be within reach, while crossing at the ford with water to the waist, Lieutenant-Colonel Lane's troop of Horse Artillery (2d of the 3d brigade) got into heavy sand before they were aware of it, and a leading horse having been shot, it was found, when the order came to limber up and retire, that one of the guns could not be moved. The Sikhs were not slow at perceiving this most inopportune embarrassment, and directed so hot a fire upon the spot, that it was found necessary to abandon the gun, although a light field battery was brought up to cover it. But the fire of the enemy from guns that were sheltered, while ours were exposed in an open plain, was so heavy that nothing could be done beyond scattering a few of the nearest groups of the enemy and then retiring. The cavalry were ordered to do the same, and take shelter from the enemy's round shot behind a rope of trees to the left, where they remained quietly for a time, the infantry being during that interim drawn up on the right. Some of the enemy being subsequently discovered on the left bank of the river further down to the left, a large number of our cavalry, among whom were the 3d and 14th Light Dragoons, moved down, by order, to dislodge them.

The interesting details of this brief but sanguinary combat, which cost us so dearly, are graphically described in the following letter from an officer who was an eye-witness of the scene:—

"Camp, Ramnuggur, November 23, 1848.

"On the morning of the 22nd instant, at 2 A.M., the orderly sergeant of the E troop came into my tent at Deeda Singh camp, and showed me the order-book, with the following command: 'The troops will parade in marching order at a quarter before 3 A.M., without sound of trumpet or bugle, and form up on their respective alarm posts.'

"The morning was pitch dark when the order to move forward was given and before we had advanced a mile, cavalry, camp-followers, artillery, and infantry were jumbled together. At length day broke, order was restored, and a report ran through the columns that Ramnuggur was in sight. Immediately

The Committee, with great thankfulness for the above liberal subscriptions, are hopefully to state that 3000 more patients were relieved during the past year than in any former year, and that the cases of accident and emergency amounted to upwards of 1900 during the year; by which the benevolent will perceive how serious has of late been the distress among the humbler classes, also how important is the Hospital to the district, which has no other Public Hospital.

The Committee deeply regret to state that the funds of the Hospital are very inadequate to meet the urgent claims of misery upon its account and they, therefore, anxiously solicit the aid of the affluent by donations or subscriptions, which will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Committee, Treasurers, and Secretary, at the Hospital, Mess. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1848.

THE little war in the Punjaub has grown into a large one. The revolt which might have been strangled in its birth at the time when Lieutenant Edwardes saved our arms from humiliation by his gallant and unauthorised self-devotion, is about to cost, or has already cost, the display of our whole strength and resources in India to suppress. It will be remembered that the standard of revolt was first raised by Moolraj, in the strong fortress of Mooltan, and that Lieutenant Edwardes kept him for awhile in check with a very small British force, aided by a native force of about 5000 men, under the command of Shere Singh. The fidelity of Shere Singh was never very greatly relied on. Lieutenant Edwardes had his suspicions, which were fully justified one fine morning, by the discovery of the fact that our Sikh ally had gone over to the enemy, and entered Mooltan with all his forces. Reinforcements to support Lieutenant Edwardes were sent, but somewhat tardily: the real character of the rebellion was discovered, and the urgency of the case was such that the Commander-in-Chief took the field in person. But Shere Singh, whose movements have been characterised by great daring and success, disappeared from Mooltan as suddenly as he had entered it, and was soon afterwards heard of in the Hazareh country. In this district, acting in conjunction with his father, Chuttur Singh, he raised large reinforcements, and avowed his object, which was one no less than the expulsion of the British forces from the Punjaub, and the consequent overthrow of our power in India. It soon became clear that there was no time to be lost in coping with him. He had an army of 40,000 men, of which one-half, at the least, were regular and well-disciplined troops, and thirty-eight pieces of artillery.

By the last mail, with dates from Calcutta to the 8th, and from Bombay to the 18th of December, we have accounts of the war, which show its full magnitude, and prepare us for important and decisive intelligence. Lord Gough joined the army on the 21st of November, at which date the advanced posts of the British forces were at Seharun, about eight miles from Rammuggur, on the Lahore side. The army under his Lordship's command is represented as one of the finest that ever took the field in India, and numbered about 22,000 men with 100 pieces of cannon. Seharun and Rammuggur are in the very centre of the Punjaub, the latter town being situated about three miles from the south bank of the river Chenab. The Chenab is the middle of the five streams that give name to the country; and Rammuggur stands nearly midway between the source of that river and its junction with the Indus. Shere Singh, who, for some days previously, had been retreating before the advance of the British troops, took up a position on the north bank of the river, nearly opposite Rammuggur; he occupied with 4000 men an island opposite his main encampment, and also took possession of a grove of trees on the British side, and sent his picquets as far as the town of Rammuggur.

On the day after the arrival of Lord Gough, a réconnaissance of the Sikh positions was decided on. A strong detachment was marched in the silence and darkness of the night to Rammuggur; but the Sikhs having received information of our object, their advanced guards withdrew from that town and retreated upon the north bank of the Chenab. When the morning dawned, Lord Gough became fully aware both of the position and of the strength of his antagonists. An attack made upon the detachment in the island, for the purpose of testing the enemy's strength in guns, proved to the Commander-in-Chief that in this respect the Sikh army was well provided. It would have been well if the doings of the day had ended here; but Shere Singh having in the very teeth of our army succeeded in landing from the island about 4000 men on the British side of the river, Lord Gough gave orders for the attack. The Sikhs were of course driven back—they never intended to retain the position; but the questionable victory which we gained over them was purchased by the loss of the brave General Cureton, Colonel Havelock, several other officers, and about forty men. This unfortunate event, upon which our daily contemporaries have commented with more or less severity, threw considerable gloom over the British army, for the loss was as needless as it was severe. The Sikhs, however, reaped no advantage from it.

On the 30th of November General Thackwell, with a strong force, was detached to cross the river three miles above Rammuggur, to attack Shere Singh in the rear, while Lord Gough remained to give a good account of him in front. General Thackwell, reinforced on his march by Colonel Godby, came upon the left flank of the Sikh army, and joined battle. An engagement ensued, of which no details have yet reached this country, but of which the result is stated in a despatch from the Commander-in-Chief, dated from head-quarters at Hillah, December 5th. In that document, the Sikh army is represented as defeated, and flying in confusion before the British army. Other accounts, however, represent the condition of the Sikh chieftain to be such as is likely to give Lord Gough much future trouble. Shere Singh has retreated, he has taken his guns and his baggage along with him, and we shall probably hear of him by the next arrivals as still in the field.

A letter from the camp at Rammuggur, of the same date as the Commander-in-Chief's despatch, states that the loss of the British has been about 400, and that of the Sikhs 4000: and that, in all probability, Shere Singh will again muster a good many beatings before he is finally defeated. The public will, doubtless, be enabled to form a more decided opinion on the arrival of the next mail, which is looked forward to with much interest and anxiety.

PREPARATORY to his proposed return to Citta Vecchia, the Pope, instigated, it would appear, by the King of Naples, has tried the effect of his once formidable anathema upon the Junta and people of Rome. He has issued a premonitory manifesto from Gaëta, threatening excommunication against all and sundry who support the national party. The effect of this document has been the reverse of what was intended; for where it has not excited contempt it has excited hostility. Personally, and as a priest, the Pope is still popular; but every acts he commits as a Sovereign tends to diminish that popularity, and to estrange him from the Romans.

No further steps have been taken in the matter of the proposed French expedition in support of his Holiness; but statements have appeared in the Paris papers which show somewhat more clearly the nature of the meditated intervention, and the designs of the various States who are willing to be parties to it. The principal Powers, it appears, who are desirous of effecting the re-establishment of the Pope by force of arms, if necessary, are Spain and Austria. France, who was long called, and still calls herself, "the eldest daughter of the Church," is not averse from lending her aid, provided the intervention can take place with a due regard for the civil rights and constitutional liberties of the Roman people. This, however, is a task which is not easy of accomplishment; and the French expedition remains at Toulon, to watch the course of events

The Prince of Canino, one of the most active leaders of the Anti-Papal party at Rome, and who aspires, probably, to the Presidentship or Chief Tribunship of a Roman Republic, is said to have written a letter to the French President, threatening that if a French expedition be sent for the re-establishment of the Papacy, he will publish letters and documents which may seriously compromise Louis Napoleon with the French people. The Sardinian Government has also protested against any interference, alleging that to the Catholic Princes of Italy alone belongs the right of intervention. The King of Sardinia has proffered his pacific mediation; and, if necessary, his armed presence in the Papal States, to take away from every non Italian Court the pretext of interference. His too kind offer has not been accepted, the Pope seeming to have a notion, if at a man whose ambition is to be the Monarch of United Italy is not the safest of friends to be relied on.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

SANITARY STATE OF THE CITY.—The City Commission of Sewers held a court on Tuesday, for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year, when the chairman, Mr. Deputy Peacock, and all the subordinate officers, were re-chosen. Twelve members of the court were then appointed to act as a board of health. Mr Simon, the medical officer, presented a report in which he states: "Serious defects of sanitary arrangements may be traced in nearly the entire district which extends from Little Moorfields (E.) to Farringdon-street (W.) from the City boundary (N.) almost to the lines of Little Britain, Falcon-street, and Addle street (S.) But I would particularly draw attention to the courts-such as Seven-Dials and West-street, Smithfield; to those which open into Long lane: and (worst of all) to those which lie above Moorgate, Milton-street, Whitecross-street, and Golden-lane, in the ward of Cripplegate. Many of the courts which adjoin Bishopsgate-street Without, and particularly those which lie between Houndsditch and Petticoat-lane (though less defective in sewerage), are yet in a very unhealthy state; and the south-east corner of the City, lying about Lt. Mourney and Rosemary-lane, calls, by the constant presence of fever, even without reference to the surveyor's plans of sewers, that its poorer parishes are almost entirely destitute of the means of drainage and purification. Besides such as those I have specified are not the only constant abode of fever, but are likewise chosen with unerring precision for the [illegible] of cholera, and the like." On the subject of slaughter-houses, Mr. Simon says: "I have had repeated meetings with the surveyor, and, with the clerk of this honorable court, have made personal inspection of several establishments, and have consulted with persons practically familiar with the matter. Slaughter-houses can only be rendered compatible with the health of the neighbouring population by the strictest provision for their perfect ventilation, perfect drainage, and perfect cleanliness. These conditions can never be fulfilled, I think, and I therefore recommend, on sanitary considerations, that all underground slaughtering be absolutely prohibited." The City Commissioners have since sent in a communication from Mr Childs, in which, amongst other suggestions, proposes the forming of a sanitary police:—" The principle I propose to establish is that of selection from the superintendence departments of water, gas, fire, and air, in whatever can preserve health or promote comfort, to be effected by the daily inspection of each and all of the highways and by-ways of the City —its streets, lanes, alleys, and courts, and the houses and tenements or dwellings shall be allowed to continue, that the advantages of water and light be uniformly enjoyed, and that the inhabitants of the City, of every condition, may enjoy the full benefit of the system of generous provisions. Notices should be periodically left with every dweller, inviting attention to our arrangements and co-operation in their observance, so that, in effect, no just cause of complaint should escape detection or elude redress." Some, the dissentrator, having been fined £5 for not removing the filth in Smithfield, the Court adjourned.

EAST INDIAN RAILWAY.—At the Court of Directors at the East Indian House on Wednesday, it was resolved to refuse the terms demanded by the East Indian Railway Company for the line from Calcutta to Delhi, or a portion thereof. On the Bombay line no discussion took place, and its progress, as therefore, not affected by this decision. In neither case will any resolution be final until sanctioned by the Board of Control.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE AID OF DRESS-MAKERS AND MILLINERS.—On Wednesday a meeting of the ladies' committee of this association was held at their offices in Clifford-street, Bond-street, the Countess Grey presiding. The report stated that, during the past year, the progress of the society was highly [illegible] principal objects of the society; viz. to reduce the inordinate hours of work prevailing—in many instances the young females employed being compelled to labour from sixteen to eighteen hours per day. The result of the efforts made by the committee has been, that, both in London and the country towns (although there are, unhappily, numerous exceptions) a marked amelioration has taken place. The report proceeded to state that the establishment of the registration system, by which many hundreds are provided with situations, the sick relief fund, a provident fund for investing savings—were also increasing in prosperity. Many deserving cases of distress have been relieved with pecuniary assistance during illness or temporary difficulties. The funds are at present low.

THE SILK TRADE.—MEETING OF THE SPITALFIELDS WEAVERS.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of the operative broad silk hand-loom weavers of Spitalfields, Bethnal-green, and the vicinity, was held at the School-House, Hargrave-street, Bethnal-green, in pursuance of a printed circular, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the necessary steps to prevent the continual reductions perpetrated in by the manufacturers, and to petition the Legislature for the establishment of local boards of trade; feeling confident that, should this fearful state of things continue, not only is the ruin of the operatives certain, but also of all tradesmen in their immediate locality." The meeting, which was numerously attended, was addressed by several of the operatives, and by the Rev. Mr. Tyler, one of the clergymen of the district, all of whom concurred in the advantages that would be derived from the establishment of boards, by accumulating a proper understanding between masters and workmen. Resolutions approving of such boards were unanimously agreed to, after which the meeting separated.

THE VERDICT IN THE CHOLERA CASES, AND THE DIRECTORS OF THE POOR OF ST. PANCRAS.—On Wednesday a special meeting of the directors of the poor of St. Pancras took place at the new vestry-room; Mr. Churchwarden Healey in the chair. Mr. Pitt read to the board the verdict of the coroner's jury in the case of Joseph John Carter, in which the jury strongly censured the board of directors for not having entered into a proper contract with Mr. Drouet in farming out the pauper children.—Mr. T. H. Smith complained of the reports and the comments in the public papers attacking the [illegible] favour had been omitted, by the journals.—Mr. Clarke observed that so far as the directors of the poor of St. Pancras were concerned, they had been exceedingly anxious to do all they could for the benefit of the pauper children; but what were the facts? The workhouse had become so overcrowded that they were compelled to fall back upon the practice adopted by other parishes, and farm out the children to create room for adult paupers, who were crowding upon them. They would have sent the children to Anerley Asylum, but that gentleman had no room, and they were obliged to send them to Mr. Drouet's. Why, however, should the Poor-law Commissioners try and get out of the responsibility—(Hear)—when it was actually upon the representations of Mr. Tuffnell, one of the Poor-law Board, that the directors of St. Pancras were induced to send their girls to Tooting? They did not contend for price. They gave Mr. Drouet the price he asked; and if he had not fulfilled his contract, the blame rested with Mr. Drouet. On the motion of Mr. Brettingham, the following resolution was agreed to:—"That a committee be appointed to draw up a report for publication throughout the parish in answer to the verdict of the coroner's jury, and other allegations against the Board of Directors, detailing all the circumstances under which the board were compelled to farm out the pauper children, to [illegible]

[illegible] evening, a full meeting of the Board of Management was held at the above institution, Dr. Dunn in the chair. A considerable anxiety appears to exist in relation to the completion of the building and the erection of the chapel for the use of the patients and officers of the institution. The still increasing number of applicants for admission daily being become fearfully oppressive, while the out-door patients keep the medical staff in constant requisition. The eighth annual report will be read at the forthcoming anniversary dinner, at which Benjamin D'Israeli, Esq., M.P., will preside.

SMITHFIELD MARKET.—Mr. J. T. Norris, one of the leading members of the corporation, has given notice of the following motion in the Court of Common Council: "That a market for the sale of live cattle in the midst of a large & crowd-cible with the convex ence of persons resorting thither for purposes of business; th t the present site of Smithfield is insufficient in space, as well as objectionable in situation; that the safety and health of the inhabitants demand its immediate removal; that, therefore, a special ward committee be appointed to consider what steps shall be taken to remedy the existing evils by providing a suitable market-place."

LEICESTER-SQUARE SOUP-KITCHEN.—We understand that from 1100 to upwards of 1200 poor persons are relieved daily at the Leicester-square soup kitchen, chiefly at the expense of its warm-hearted treasurer; on Sunday, 1230 on Saturday last, 1131 on Monday, and 1273 on Tuesday. We regret to [illegible] bers; so that hundreds of destitute and forlorn creatures must of necessity pass the day without food of any kind.

TOOTING CHOLERA CASES.—The medical officers of the Board of Health have been directed to visit all pauper institutions where children of tender age are brought up, with the view of ascertaining their condition and general treatment. No death from cholera has occurred for some days at Tooting. The farm, too, which took possession of the unfortunate few in that village and its neighbourhood, have subsided. The only parties who are now chiefly suffering inconvenience and loss from the outbreak of the disease are the proprietors of boarding-schools. Their pupils were nearly all taken away by their parents and guardians during the prevalence of the disease, and it is feared they will not be sent back for some time to come.

FOREIGN WATCHES SOLD BY THE CUSTOM-HOUSE.—Early last year 326 watches were seized from being entered at too low a value, and paid for with the amount or 10 per cent, as usual in these cases. They were subsequently entered for sale as gold watches in the usual manner, and purchased by constant agents after our destination was confirmed, and the enemy was stated to be in position in our front.

"At 7 o'clock A.M. we reached Ramnuggur, and saw the enemy and their camp in the distance; at half-past 7 o'clock the 3rd Dragoons (Holmes's), irregulars, and the artillery, were pushed forward with her Majesty's 61st Regiment in skirmishing order, and we, with the 5th Cavalry and some Native Infantry, were ordered to halt on the right of the city, with the 2nd Europeans a little on the left rear. A few minutes after the enemy opened their fire. This continued about an hour, during which time we stood inactively admiring their shot and shells as they flew through or burst in the air.

"At about half-past 8 A.M. our guns had got into position and began replying to the enemy, when the order came for us to advance, which we did, and were halted about three-quarters of a mile from where the enemy's picquet had been. Their picquet tents were still standing on an intrenched piece of ground, but their picquet had retired across the river.

"The round shot now began to whistle near us, generally falling short, and the men to get excited, when, about 9 A.M., the order came for us to move more to the left, and get shelter from a tope of trees nearer to and more in front of the enemy's guns. Here we saw the 3d Dragoons, who were more than a mile on our left, charging some Sikh cavalry, who, retiring before them, opened out and dispersed the moment they drew the 3rd within range of their batteries, which immediately opened on them. One man was killed and three wounded by the fire, while several horses suffered. A staff officer sent by Lord Gough ordered them to retire immediately out of fire, as the guns were on the other side of the river. While doing so, a 9-lb. shot struck Captain Curry's horse, passing clear through him, but the rider fortunately escaped. In a few moments after the horse was stripped by the Sikh cavalry, who pressed on their rear, trying again to draw them under fire. During all this time the round shot were flying over and through the 14th Dragoons, and, strange to say, doing no harm. A little after 11 A.M. the enemy's cavalry came across the nullah that protected part of their front, and formed upon the left bank, to the right front of the 14th, in great force, when the 14th Dragoons and 5th Cavalry received orders to charge them.

"Before saying anything of this charge, I must try to describe the Sikh position. The Sikhs, to the number of 30,000 men, occupied the right bank of the Chenab, where they had a strong entrenched camp with several batteries erected. A little to the right front of Ramnuggur the river formed a bend; in it was an island containg a couple of acres of ground, and between that and the left bank the water was about thirty yards wide, with a precipitous fall from the left bank of five or six feet before you got into its bed, which was in some parts four feet deep. This part is called the nullah, as the main branch of the river is on the right of the island; it is as nearly as possible in front of the centre of the Sikh position. On it were about 4000 men and a battery of six guns, while the approach to it was swept by a cross fire from two batteries on the main-land. Knowing nothing of this position, and deeming the nullah the river, the 14th, when ordered to charge, galloped on to the enemy's cavalry, who retired through the nullah on to the island, while the enemy's batteries opened their fire, and their infantry on the island poured in their vollies. Colonel Havelock, cheering, led on the 1st and 2d squadrons of the 14th down to the bank, then into the nullah; crossed it at a gallop, and sabred hundreds of the enemy under the most frightful shower of missiles from their cannon and matchlocks. They then retired a short distance, formed up, were joined by the other squadrons and the 5th cavalry, who had crossed a little higher up, and charged again. In this, the second charge, Colonel Havelock met his death, it was supposed, for he was not seen or heard of after. Many had fallen by this time, and more were falling, when they again retired, formed up, and charged under the command of Colonel King, for the third and last time. During this charge General Cureton joined them, with orders to retire, as, though the 14th seemed so determined to destroy the enemy, they were utterly indifferent to their own loss. The Commander-in-Chief having cleared the left bank of the enemy, did not wish for more. While he was giving the order to retire, a matchlock-ball struck General Cureton in the throat, and another in the forehead; and thus fell this glorious man, the finest cavalry officer of the day, at the head of that regiment in which, as a private soldier, under the assumed name of Roberts, he had commenced his career, and out of which he received his first commission.

"The 14th then retired in order, formed up, and the roll was called, when 45 men of the 14th were found missing, and about 50 horses. Of the missing men, 14 were killed, and the remainder wounded. One of the killed, Sergeant Todd, had his head taken off by a round shot. Colonel Havelock has not yet been ound. The last seen of him was in the second charge, while he was crossing the nullah. His orderly states that both the Colonel and his horse fell wounded or killed, that he was hurried on, and did not see him after.

"About 19 of the 5th Cavalry suffered, I am told; and one of the first round shot fired at the charging regiments took off the arm of Colonel Alexander, who commanded them.

"Nothing could exceed the accuracy of the enemy's fire; their range was beautifully taken for certain points, showing that they must have discovered them previous to our advance; and our artillery officers say they never saw anything finer than the way their Horse Artillery were brought up to the edge of the river, and formed up. No nation could exceed them in the rapidity of their fire. It is said that a Frenchman, late an officer in the Maharajah Runjeet Singh's service, and aide-de-camp to General Avitable, named L'Enfant, commands them. No men could act more bravely than the Sikhs. They faced us the moment we came on them, firing all the time, and, when we did come on them, some opened out and immediately after closed round us, while others threw themselves on their faces or turned their backs, protected by a shield from the stroke of the Dragoon sabre, and the moment that was given, turned round, hamstrung the horse, and shot the rider, while their individual acts of bravery were the admiration of all. Many stood before a charging squadron, and singled out a man, after killing or wounding whom they themselves were cut down immediately; while many, before their blows could take effect, received the point of a sabre, and fell in the act of making a cut.

"Amongst our officers, Captain Gall's personal courage was most conspicuous. He took single-handed one of the enemy's standards, but, before he could get assistance, he was knocked over, and his right hand nearly severed from his body; some of his men, however, rushed to his rescue, and saved him from receiving a mortal wound, though they could not again recover the standard which he had so hardly fought and suffered for.

"After Captain Gall was knocked over, a young cornet, named Durham Blythe, rode at the head of the troop, and while charging saw Lieutenant Macmahon fall wounded a little way off, and a Sikh rushing forward to kill him. Cornet Blythe galloped forward, gave point, and sent his blade clean through the Sikh. On three different occasions afterwards he rushed out from his troop, and each time, in single combat, killed his man. Many private soldiers performed wonders. But I must not omit to mention, that after Captain Fitzgerald fell, Captain Wilmer's troop was passing on their return, when they saw he was alive. Captain Wilmer and four troopers dismounted, and succeeded in bringing him in under the most frightful fire. All agree in one thing, that, however nobly the 14th gained their laurels in the Peninsula, no charge they ever made could surpass this in gallantry, and yet not more than four or five of the officers and men had ever been under fire previously. It is impossible to say what loss the enemy sustained; but had the 14th not been broken by jumping into the nullah, more than half the regiment must have been destroyed, so severe was the fire, as all the shot, had they charged in close order, would have taken effect.

"I have heretofore omitted saying anything of Colonel King, as he had little to do beyond assisting to keep the men together and obey orders until Colonel Havelock was killed. From the moment, however, his loss was known, Colonel King took up the command, and ably did he carry on the duties that were entrusted to him. To his coolness and judgment the men attribute their final success in the third charge, and to his watchful care the greater number of the wounded that were brought in owe their safety. Officers and men agree that his admirable conduct on that occasion proves him an able successor.

"Lord Gough visited the wounded yesterday, and expressed himself to each in the kindest terms about his injuries, and with the strongest praise of his brave conduct.

"As I conclude this we are erecting batteries, and expecting to be joined by Brigadier Wheeler's force, and two regiments of Eckford's brigade, that remained behind at Lahore.

"The enemy are about being reinforced by Chuttur Singh, who has 40,000 men and about 60 guns with him; and report says they will try to turn our rear; but we only wish that, as the men are all in high spirits, and determined to show them no quarter.

"The enemy's guns never cease firing; we are continually having their round shot bowling into us, but doing little damage."

Another writer observes:—"An attempt will doubtless be made to cast some blame upon the Commander-in-Chief for the result of these two affairs, but not justly. The facts are, that General Cureton ordered, in the first instance, both movements; and, if they had been carried out as he had wished, they would have been attended with the happiest results; but, on both occasions, mistakes in the execution, to a great degree unavoidable, marred the original plan. In both cases the ardour of our troops was too great. It was a rush who should get at the enemy first; but it must have been most gratifying to the Commander-in-Chief to witness the brilliant conduct of the regiments engaged, and the intrepidity with which they were led by their officers."

The following is a correct account of our loss:—

Killed. Brigadier-General Cureton shot through the heart; Colonel Havelock, 14th Dragoons, missing, but subsequently found killed; Captain Fitzgerald, 14th Dragoons, killed.

Taught by the result of this conflict on the 22nd, the Sikhs no longer dared to cross the ford, as they had previously done, or to attempt seriously to molest our camp. The artillery got up on the 30th; and before 48 hours had elapsed, thanks to the noble exertions of some of her Majesty's troops (especially the 29th Foot), three powerful batteries had been erected along the river at the most favourable positions, each within 1200 yards of the enemy's camp. The batteries opened fire, were subsequently pushed nearer, and, simultaneously with these measures, the operations which ended in the retreat of the Sikh army were undertaken. Those operations consisted chiefly of a well-planned diversion, conducted by Major-General Sir J. Thackwell, whose division was subsequently supported by a second body of troops.

The Sikh army, which amounted to 30,000 men, with a park of heavy artillery, had their attention engaged at the main ford, near Ramnuggur, by the forces under the Commander-in-Chief, while Sir J. Thackwell crossed the Chenab, with some regiments of cavalry and horse-artillery, at Wuzeerabad, 25 miles above Ramnuggur (the position of the British camp), intending to fall on the enemy's flank, and to attack their lines simultaneously with the passage of the river and attack by storm from the main position under Lord Gough. The enemy's attention had previously been almost solely directed, and not without reason, to the preparations which had been going forward for some days in the British camp for the erection of batteries to cover the passage of the river, and to overpower the enemy's guns. It was this fact, as well as the unsuccessful issue of an attempt immediately made by a strong division under Shere Singh himself (on the 3rd of December) to arrest Thackwell's progress—resulting in a decided defeat on their part—and also the completeness of the force with which the flank movement, when at length it had declared itself, was conducted, that caused the diversion to be regarded by the Sikhs (who were justly apprehensive of a joint attack on the front, flank, and rear) as the signal for their retreat, which they effected on the night of the 3rd, carrying off with them their artillery, ammunition, and baggage. In all these affairs our killed and wounded have been about 400, while the enemy lost about 4000.

We have accounts from Goomsoor reporting fresh disturbances in that district. On the night of the 7th of November, a body of Chokra Bisye's partisans plundered and burned the village of Kontadore. On the 11th, Captain M'Vicar proceeded to Chokapard, with two companies of the 18th N. I., and Colonel Campbell proceeded to the hills on the 12th, also with an escort of two companies of the 18th, and a party of Sebundies. Chokra Bisye sent a letter to the people of Ganjam, threatening the destruction of their property, which induced them to call a meeting on the 14th, two or three thousand persons were present, and they petitioned the Government that steps might be taken to protect them from the outrages of the rebels.

By the latest advices received in Bombay, Lord Gough had crossed the Chenab with his camp some ten miles.

There is no news of the fall of Moultan. The last division of the Scinde field force left Sukkur on Nov. 20.

There is intelligence of the investment of Attock, in which was Lieut Herbert, by a large body of the Sikhs on November 20.

Major Lawrence and his family had been given up to Chuttur Sing by the chief with whom he had taken refuge at Kohat, and who owed to him his fortunes. Chuttur, it is said, treated his prisoners with every mark of respect, although, of course, they were strictly watched in his camp

The Governor-General was to leave Umballah on the 9th of December, in progress to Loodianah; and Captain Larkins, the deputy-commissioner, was to meet his Lordship at Kana-keserale.

Brigadier Wheeler, who is at the head of a strong force in the Reechna Doab, has achieved a victory over the rebels at a place called Hillawalla (or Khuloolwalla), where two brothers, Chunda and Goordut Singh, have been recently creating disturbances.

In the Jullundur Doab disturbance has likewise prevailed. The treasury at Hoshearpore was recently attacked and robbed by a party of Sikhs, under Ram Singh, and some 20,000 rupees carried off. At Jullundur itself, the garrison, consisting of the 7th Native Infantry only, were in great fear of an attack, and the treasure had been removed to camp, and entrenchments thrown up for its protection.

At Lahore all was quiet. The garrison consisted of some six thousand men, and another corps of irregular cavalry was expected to reinforce them. Guns were being placed in position on the walls of the citadel.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

The first Engraving upon the opposite page shows Shere Singh, with his body-guard, and a group of Sikh troops; the Portrait of Shere Singh being from Major Lawrence's popular "Adventures."

In the second Engraving, we have a view of Peryaneh, near Istalif, with a party of Huzzarehs firing with juzailes, or matchlocks, which proved so unerring in the late conflict. This scene is copied from one of Captain Lock Willis Hart's very clever "Sketches in Afghanistan and the Punjab."

BRIGADIER-GENERAL CURETON, C.B.

CHARLES ROBERT CURETON, whose brilliant military career terminated so gloriously in the late sanguinary conflict in the Punjaub, enlisted originally as a private, under the assumed name of Roberts, in the 14th Dragoons. This was in the year 1808, when the young soldier proceeded forthwith to the Peninsula and served to the close of the war, being engaged in the battles of Talavera, Busaco, Fuentes d'Onor, Salamanca, Vittoria, Orthès, Tarbès, and Toulouse, and at the siege of Badajos and the capture of Madrid. The daring gallantry of Cureton, which exposed him always in the hottest of the fight, and resulted in several severe wounds. He was wounded in the right leg by a rifle-ball on crossing the Mondago, near Coimbra, October 1, 1810; at the battle of Fuentes d'Onor, in May, in the following year, he received a severe sabre cut on the head and another on his rein-hand. In February, 1814, he was promoted to an ensigncy in the 14th Dragoons, without purchase, in consideration of his gallant behaviour and services. Subsequently he went to the East Indies, and was there employed for a period of nearly thirty years. He served under Lord Combermere at the siege of Bhurtpore, in 1825-26, and added to his reputation by the ability and courage he displayed. He had then attained, by purchase, to the rank of Captain

He served as Assistant-Adjutant-General of Cavalry in the campaign in Affghanistan, under Lord Keane, in 1839-40, and was present at the assault and capture of Ghuznee (medal); was specially selected to command the advance column of the army on its route through the Bolan Pass, and entrance into Affghanistan; and was also selected to command a force of cavalry detached in advance of the army to seize the enemy's guns, and to secure possession of the citadel.

In 1845, on the outbreak of the Sikh war, the gallant officer, then Lieutenant-Colonel, was called [illegible] service in the eventful campaign that followed [illegible] branch he commanded the cavalry corps, and bartled well, as in inconsiderable degree, in the glory of those famous victories. "In Brigadier Cureton" (as are quoting Sir Harry Smith's official despatch) "her Majesty has one of those officers rarely met with: the cool experience of an old veteran soldier is combined with youthful energy and enthusiasm." His knowledge of the outpost duty, and the able manner in which he has on [illegible] on the most trying and hazardous occasions, the first cavalry officers [illegible] services, Lieutenant-Colonel Cureton was appointed, in the [illegible] quarter, made a Companion of the Bath, and appointed Aide-de-Camp to the Queen. He also received the important office of Adjutant-General of the Bengal Army, which had been previously held by Sir Harry Smith. All this time, however, he was added, that Brigadier-General Cureton accompanied Lord Gough's army to the Punjaub, and, in the discharge of his duty, met with an honourable death, at the head of the very regiment in which he had obscurely commenced the life of his choice, and in which he had received the first public reward of his valour, and with which his services and his renown were unchangeably identified.

The following order has been issued

"GENERAL ORDER TO THE ARMY OF THE PUNJAUB.

"Head-quarters, Camp Ramnuggur, Nov. 23, 1848.

"Aware of the general esteem and respect in which Brigadier General Cureton was held by officers and men who enjoyed an opportunity of serving under his command, or being associated with him either on duty or in private life, the Commander-in-Chief invites all so disposed to be in attendance, to pay the last honours to this excellent officer, whose decease no officer in the army can more deeply lament than Lord Gough himself." Morning Chronicle, Dec. 8.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.

THE specification of this patent is at length finished; and a careful perusal of the document affords matter for considerable consideration, as, unfortunately, it is but a sample of the numerous specifications of absolute impossibilities which we are afraid too frequently exist amongst the parchments of the Enrolment-office.

In our former notices of the Electric Light, we showed that success or failure would depend upon the cost of the production of the voltaic power; therefore, we shall confine our attention to those parts of the specification which appertain to its economic production.

"To economise the production, when zinc is employed, I add (says the patentee), in a separate vessel, to the solution of sulphate of zinc a solu ion of sesquicarbonate of ammonia, which precipitates the oxide of the zinc metal, and releases the acid, which may be used again. Our curious, but unscientific friend, that there is no mistake in this paragraph; that it is either misquoted or misprinted, but we regret to state that it actually exists in the patent. We need hardly state, that every schoolboy, where chemistry is taught, knows that it would be impracticable to set free sulphuric acid by such means.

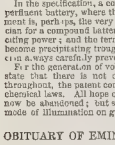
Again, the patentee speaks of using platinised plates of lead, or other metal, as the source of power. Now, the effect of adding platinum to the lead, or other metal, would be to increase local action, which would not in any manner contribute to the general power of the battery. Lead, moreover, as a positive pole, gives rise to a current of but very feeble intensity, and one, perhaps, quite inapplicable for the evolution of light.

In the specification, a considerable space is dedicated to the description of a peculiar battery, where the exciting fluid passes from cell to cell. This arrangement is, perhaps, the very worst which could possibly be adopted by the electrician for a compound battery, as every cell would possess a fluid of different exciting power; and the terminal cells, if his intentions were carried out, would become precipitating troughs instead of battery cells—a state which the electrician always carefully prevents.

For the generation of voltaic power, or its economic production, we regret to state that there is not one single addition to our stock of knowledge; but throughout, the patent contents statements in direct violation of electrical and chemical laws. All hope of an extensive application of the Electric Light must now be abandoned; but still we shall rejoice if it can be employed as a special mode of illumination on great public occasions.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

MRS. HOWARD, OF CORBY CASTLE.



CATHERINE-MARY, widow of Henry Howard, Esq., of Corby Castle, in Cumberland, and second daughter of Sir Richard Neave, Bart., of Dagnam Park, Essex, died on the 16th inst., in her 79th year. Her loss is severely felt and lamented. The issue of her marriage with the late estimable Mr Howard consists of two sons and three daughters—viz. Philip-Henry, M.P. for Carlisle; Henry-Francis, a diplomatist; Catherine, married to the Hon. Phillip Stanton; Emma Agnes, wife of Lord Petre; and Adeliza-Maria, married to her cousin, Henry Paine, Esq., of Dunkenhalgh.

The Howards of Corby are a distinguished branch of the ducal house of Norfolk, deriving from Lord William Howard, renowned in Border minstrelsy as "belted Will." The beautiful demesne of Corby with its castle on the summit, a sumptuous cliff overhanging the east side of the river Eden, attracts the admiration of every beholder. Hume, the historian, when on a tour through Cumberland, wrote on a pane of glass in the Oak Bush Inn, Carlisle, these lines:—

Here chicks, in eggs for breakfast sprawl,
Here gudlins leave God's gracious spell,
Where Scotsmen's heads adorn the wall,
But Corby's walks adorn for all.

The late Mr. Howard of Corby, whose is the subject of this brief notice, died 1st March, 1842, in the enjoyment of the highest reputation for piety, patriotism, and virtue, and was not less distinguished by his courtesy and kindness than by his literary attainments and his correct taste.

COAST OF AFRICA.—Private letters just received from the coast of Africa state that Lieutenant-Governor Winniett was preparing for a mission to the King of Ashantee. Captain Winniett will be the first Lieutenant-Governor who has ever visited that warlike chief, and it is thought much good may be expected from his visit. The King's most anxious desire is for his trade, and great preparations are being made at Kommasi for his reception. It is supposed the Lieutenant-Governor will be received by at least 30,000 men. The officer visited the King of Dahomey while on his way, and has ratified so far—and succeeded with that chief in executing a treaty of amity and commerce, the benefit of which is now being felt by the merchants at Whydah. He has also despatched an officer to the King with a view to the suppression of the slave trade in his dominions; and if it be accomplished, all the cruel ers in the Bight may be removed. We find also that the Lieutenant-Governor has lately returned from leading an army of 6000 against a rebel chief of Appolonia, with complete success, which has thrown a beautiful country open to commerce that had been for many years completely shut up. He also rode all 120 prisoners of different tribes, whom the King had heavily fined, and, in all probability, a still more sacrificial at his next custom-making. The Lieutenant-Governor has received a most flattering address from the magistrates, merchants, and others, residing on the Gold Coast.

REPRESENTATIVES.—There has been much excitement in the House of Representatives, in consequence of a disclosure recently made by a member, Mr. Greeley, in the columns of his own paper, the Tribune. He obtained access to the treasury records, and there ascertained that several members were in the habit of receiving for each mile of their journey to and from Washington. This is allowed by law, in addition to their per diem allowance. The result, caused by all who knew anything about currencies, was rather astounding to the people at large. It was ascertained, that the members generally made out their bills for the longest possible routes of travel, although they themselves took the shortest routes. Thus, a member from the West, who expended perhaps 200 dollars in journeying to Washington, might draw 2000 dollars for his mileage bills for that period of session, sometimes of long usage, and growing out of the real difficulty of reaching Washington before railways and steamers were common, had ceased to alarm the virtue of the greatest economist of the public money. When the facts came out, however, there was much squirming in the House.—Correspondent of the Daily News.

A JEWEL OF A WOMAN.—The editor of a Philadelphia paper takes notice of a lady at a late concert in that city, who had nineteen rings upon her fingers, thirteen bracelets of different descriptions upon her arms, which were bare to the shoulder and very handsome. Her hands were small, white, and beautiful. Some of the rings contained diamonds of large size, and whenever she moved her hand it appeared to be in a blaze of light. This gaily-decked lady was a subject of admiration to some of every numbers, and of pity to a few. Her fan was expensive, and secured to her wrist by a heavy gold chain. She wore ear-rings and a breast-pin. Altogether she presented the appearance of a walking jeweller's store, and so far as the most valuable woman, literally speaking, that he had ever seen.

ALGERIA.—The Commission of the Colonists of Algeria have just published several letters from the colonists, expressing their satisfaction at the provision made for their transit by the Government, and their confidence, from what has already occurred, that they will be able to earn an honourable subsistence. Many of these colonists are possessed of means, and of plenty to live with. Such are the character of the families in Paris to join them. They state that their health is good, and that the climate is favourable.

The Earl of Northesk has intimated to all the tenants on his estates in Forfar and Lanark, that, in consequence of the present depressed state of the corn markets, he intends postponing the collection of his Candlemas rents till the month of April next, hoping that, ere that time, they may have disposed of the grain to better advantage than they possibly could do at present.

On Sunday morning, about ten o'clock, an extensive fall of the chalk cliffs from Shakspere's Cliff, Dover, took place. The fall occurred near No. 4, East of the Shakspere tunnel, on the South-eastern Railway, and left an indentation in the crown of this classic cliff of something like an acre. The quantity of chalk detached may be estimated at about 100,000 tons.

LITERATURE.

THE KEEPSAKE, 1849. Edited by the COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON. Bogue.

A charming portrait of the Lady Constance Gower forms the frontispiece to this superb volume, in addition to several other illustrations, selected and engraved under the superintendence of the late Mr. Charles Heath, who, if we mistake not, originated the highpriced Annual. In the roll of contributors are the Countess of Blessington, Mrs. S. C. Hall, Mrs Romer, and Mrs. Newton Crosland (late Camilla Toulmin); Sir E Bulwer Lytton, Mr. Thackeray, Mr. Albert Smith, Dr. Beattie, Lord John Manners, R. M. Milnes, Esq., &c. The papers are playful and sparkling, alternately with serious and romantic adventure gathered during recent travel; and the volume is, altogether, a delightful accession to the drawingroom table.

ANECDOTES OF THE ARISTOCRACY, AND EPISODES IN ANCESTRAL STORY. By J. BERNARD BURKE, Esq. 2 vols. Colburn.

The Family History of Great Britain abounds with strange and startling episodes and romantic adventure, even lay-ing aside legend and tradition; whilst almost every great House has some strange event interwoven with its rise or grandeur, or some calamity damning the brilliancy of its achievements. Such form the staple of these two volumes. The narratives are carefully written, and selected with fitting taste: the names and incidents are very various, according as education, property, or politics, the charms of domestic life, the love of travel or war, actuate the heroes and heroines. The work is a sort of written gallery of family portraits and events, strongly marked with individual character, and vividly painted from first to last. The contents are more numerous than we have space to particularise, being some 180 narratives of rare cheap-ness of human action. The book, we need scarcely add, must prove attractive to a large class of readers.

GEOLOGICAL AND MINERALOGICAL NOTES, TO ACCOMPANY MR. WYLD'S MAP OF THE GOLD REGION OF CALIFORNIA. Wyld.

This is a facsimile of very useful and well-timed information upon the physical and civil geography of California. It is very authentic, and free, or very nearly free, from the "Dorado" and "Factolus" phraseology in which the Americans write about the matter. We quote a section, which may be termed

HOW TO GET THERE.

The ways to California from Europe are three: first, through the United States, across the isthmuses; third, around Cape Horn. 1. The first way is by steamer to Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, and then up the heads of the Missouri, across the Rocky Mountains, to the Sacramento. The overland journey is of three months in a country without accommodation, beset with Indians, and in some parts with snow. Few or well-armed travellers go together in parties, carrying their goods in waggons, or on the backs of mules and horses. Travellers from New England may go to New Orleans, and so up the Mississippi and Missouri. The people of Texas have a way by the Rio Bravo del Norte into New Mexico, then across the Rocky Mountains. 2. The second way is by the West Indies and thence to Panama, or by steamer to Chagres, in the state of Panama, New Granada, and so by an overland journey of fifty miles or two days to Panama on the Pacific. A steamer is to be put on the Chagres river. The road between Chagres and Panama has been just repaired by the local authorities by means of a loan from the Royal Steam Navigation Company. The town of Chagres is the unhealthiest in the world, that of Panama tolerably good. At Panama the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's steamers arrive from Valparaiso and Callao. Here too is an American mail steamer running to California once in six weeks, and after April next once a month. Passengers can therefore go on by this steamer, or by sailing-vessel, to California. This is reckoned a three months' journey, and is a very expensive one. Very little luggage can be carried. 3 The third way is by ship throughout from England to California, round Cape Horn, a six months' voyage. The Engl ish have a settlement in the Falkland Islands, near Cape Horn, which is likely to benefit by the increased trade to the Pacific. Passengers by sea may get round Cape Horn most readily by taking a berth for Valparaiso in Chili, for which many ships go out, bringing back copper-ore, guano, hides, and tallow, while ships for California must be chartered purposely. From Valparaiso passengers may get on either by coasting-vessels trading with California or by the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's steamers to Panama, and thence, as said, by the American Government steamers to California.

THE ART OF ILLUMINATION AND MISSAL PAINTING By H. NOEL HUMPHREYS. Bohn

The revival of illumination, a beautiful branch of Middle Age art, has, we fear, been productive of comparatively little gain to the artists of the present day. It is one thing to copy, and another to become possessed with the genius of a master: our draughtsmen appear but to have succeeded in the former facile task, and even in this they have shown but little discrimination. Such is the opinion of Mr. Humphreys, which every-day remark among persons acquainted with the subject confirms

The art of illumination originated, very probably, soon after the rolled MSS. were superseded by books in the present form, by some time or other in the leaves sewn together at the backs. The rolled form of papyrus or parchment was altogether inconvenient for pictorial ornament: hence the unrolled treasures of Herculaneum and Pompeii bear such exhibitions but "while," says Mr Humphreys, "some of the earliest MSS. of the new or book form, which was, probably, adopted about the second century of the Christian era, contain pictorial decorations more or less rich. The Dioscorides in the library of Vienna, and the celebrated 'Virgil' of the Vatican, both said to be of the fourth century, may be cited as among the earliest examples of illuminated MSS., each being profusely enriched with illustrations, the style of decorative ornament being, however, very simple, and in the 'Virgil' altogether absent, whilst the miniatures are also large and striking." Profuse decoration was not, however, uncommon at this period; for St. Jerome, in the fourth century, complained of the abuse of this art, in filling up books with decorative pictures of ornaments.

"The best portion of the early illumination was its miniature portraits; as the arts of Rome declined, this power of executing miniatures was lost, and the decorations luxuriated into mere ornament. In Gaul these ornaments took a Roman character, but so impure as to be styled Franco-Roman. In Italy a more Asonan style prevailed; a sort of tradition of the graceful school of painting, of which we have examples in Pompeii. But in England, where the Romans arts had never been so fully developed as in Gaul, they nearly disappeared with the departure of the Romans at the beginning of the fifth century; and the rude Saxons who succeeded them in the dominion of the island, received their inspirations of art from the rapidly advancing civilization of the Irish, who in the eighth centu y had attained a pitch of general refinement very far in advance of that of England. The style of art there developed was original, and was communicated to the rest of the Anglo-Saxons. A beautiful specimen of this style is preserved in Lambeth Palace, called this Mr. Humphreys has copied. From the seventh to the thirteenth century, ornament predominated over pictures; it reached extreme gorgeousness in the twelfth century: in the next, the drawing of the human figure, as well as of animals and birds, greatly improved, for these subjects began to be profusely used in the extra enrichment of the curiously interlaced initials, which, in the previous century, had been nearly confined to foliage. In the fourteenth century we have the origin of the illuminated border in the Gothic bracket or clay: "it arose, probably, from the long-tailed initials of the preceding century, which were frequently made to extend down the whole margin. In the fourteenth century, too, miniatures began to be interpolated, and increased in finish, splendour, and profusion, till the middle of the sixteenth century."

The Gothic bracket of this period consists of a bordure at top and bottom, and outer margin of the page, which was eventually entirely one used by it. It soon lost the bracket form, and with it a its purity, until it degenerated, in the 17th century, into the wretched style of the Continental books of that period. In England this art, finally disappeared

In the sketch of the progress of the art succeed analyses of the specimens Mr. Humphreys has selected, showing how they may be applied to modern practice. There is a curious chapter on the "Opus Anglicum" (English work), supposed to have been practised exclusively in England, in the tenth century, and, from a specimen in the British Museum, to have been executed by St Dunstan, who is known to have been a skilful goldsmith and illuminator.

It is difficult to convey an idea of the peculiar beauties, yet sometimes elegant character of the specimens selected. Nearly all are selected from old missals, and therefore contain in the border scenes from Scripture, in which the incidents are treated in scrupulous detail, and often with much humour.

The work is altogether produced with great care, both as regards its illustrations and its typographical research. The volume is beautiful, bound in white calf, most superbly illuminated and gilded.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPEDITION.—We regret to announce, by accounts from Marathon, under date Nov. 20, that her Majesty's surveying ship, Herald, 22, Captain Acheld, had arrived at that port from Behring's Straits, without having been able to obtain any intelligence of the expedition under Sir John Franklin.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.—The Rev. G. A. Denison (brother to the Bishop of Salisbury), who has been so active of late in opposition to the Committee of Council on Education, has given notice to the National Society, that at the forthcoming annual meeting of the National Society he will move the following resolutions: "First. That it is the opinion of this meeting that it is just and necessary that the two following conditions of State assistance be imposed by the State upon the founders and promoters of Church schools: That the site of the school buildings be legally secured by trusts legally constituted. 2. That the school be open to Government inspection, for the purpose of ascertaining its efficiency, and of regulating the amount of State assistance; provided always, that such inspection shall not exceed the precise limits of the letter and of the spirit of the agreement of 1840. Second. That it is the opinion of this meeting that it is not just, and not necessary, that any other conditions of State assistance, besides the two above specified, be imposed by the State upon the founders and promoters of Church schools. Third. That it is the opinion of this meeting that the attempt on the part of the Committee of Council on Education to impose certain other conditions of State assistance, besides the two above specified, has operated, and must continue to operate, as a heavy penalty upon the founders and promoters of Church Schools, and as a great and growing hindrance in the way of the education of the people."

THE BURRA-BURRA MINES.—South Australian papers to the latter end of the 14th of October, mention that mining affairs were progressing satisfactorily. The differences between the miners at the Burra-Burra had been made up, and the workings were going on as usual.

[illegible] by MM. Desplechin and Thierry. The action is in Brittany. As the title [illegible] serve, it is the story of "Patrie" which has suggested to the librettist a theme to turn to account his powers as a violinist as well as those of a dancer. The ballet is constructed for himself, for without his executive facility as a player it could not be performed [illegible]

The incidents [illegible] of a very ancient date in ballad-history. There is the spirit of evil, a Duc de Mistheus (Coralli), who has for mate, just a Father Anselm (Comte); and these two agents combat for the soul of [illegible]ent (St. Leon), who loves Héléne (Cerito), the daughte[illegible] (Lenfert), the latter [illegible]

[illegible] Orbais declines this contract, and is [illegible]ained to return his fiddle, preferring to lose his mistress rather than his soul. Father Anselm then intervenes, of course, and gives Urbain another fiddle, of impulse tone: thus St. Leon, who has, in the first act, been exercising caricatured freaks of a Paganini, passe-aere, staccato, & [illegible] in the second act plays an adagio like a De Beriot or an Allard; in each style, in fact, that the Count rejects as it gives his consent for the marriage of his daughter with Urbain. The ballet then concludes with a grand fête in the Salle des Spectacles of the Count's château.

This fête consists of a divertissement in a conservatory with bowers; and on colossal stands of dahlias, camelias, &c., are concealed danseuses, styled "Les Fleurs Animées," who are gradually attended to by St. Leon in the garb of a gardener. The mise is a charming scene, and indeed is the scene of the ballet, which is otherwise long and dull enough. Head is clever trick of the suspension aérienne is well executed. But for St. Leon's violin playing, which is really very skilful, and Cerito's delicious dancing, the ballet would be intolerable. St. Leon has played frequently at London concerts, but never so well as on this occasion. The "Ta ta Polacca di Demon," by Cerito, with St. Leon's violin obligato, was very animated. There is a pretty "pas de douze," in which Mdlle. Louise Taglioni and Madame Robert gained distinction; and a grand chasse of the animated flowers, towards the end, was a brilliant finale. Attended less than the opera, the ballet might become popular, but it is tiresome in its present shape. St. Leon, if not strong in fancy, is artistic in grouping.

The President, Prince Louis, was present at the ballet; between the acts some persons in the opposite stalls to get up a cheer for him; it was put down by the genuine applause with one of the most determined "Oh's" I ever heard in a French theatre. So much for the duration of popularity in Paris! I could scarcely believe my ears, when I recollected that nearly seven millions had voted for him but a few weeks since. This fact reminds me of the new piece just produced at the Théâtre du Vaudeville, called "Les Trente mille Ilés," by MM. Lenvens and Brunswick. Like the "Propriété c'est le Vol," it is a musical satire on current political events, and its success has been enormous. I was present at the performance on Saturday night, when both pieces were given. The house was [illegible]

[illegible] of great services to the country, and replies, "We dismiss him." The "Questions brulantes" are neatly posed by a hawker of gingerbread, who sells Cavaignac and Ledru-et Honour. Capital is shewn, with all his trepidation, in a golden coat, with a waistcoat made buttons of which are made of five-franc pieces, and braided with bank-notes. Ilôtel, with her son, Caprice, found an electric journal, the events in which are represented by living personages. [illegible] at the end there is a drop-scene representing a huge newspaper, with parodies on leading articles and the advertisements, &c., something similar to the one published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS at Christmas. The "canards," "ridicules," &c. are amusingly written in the Vaudeville musical journal, a monthly edition of which is promised by the authors.

The Théâtre Italien, which opened so well on Tuesday week, has had two indifferent houses since, despite of Alboni, Ronconi, and Lablache, in the "Cenerentola." Alboni is to appear in Rossini's "Italiana in Algeri," in the "Barbiere," in "Nineta," in "La Gazza Ladra," and in "Tancredi." Lablache, who leaves for Baïle's concert in London on the 29th, and a month's tour in the English provinces, has promised to return in March, should the theatre be still open, which seems [illegible]

[illegible] representation of "Corentenola" was postponed.

The "Prophète" of Meyerbeer is to be produced, that the stage rehearsals will commence early in February. The cast will include Madame Viardot, Madame Castellan, MM. Roger, Levasseur, and Brémond. The divertissements incidental to the opera are already in practice.

A LECTURER ON MUSIC BY SIR HENRY BISHOP, AT THE WHITTINGTON CLUB.—We are old enough to remember Sir Henry Bishop in the zenith of his efforts as a composer; and we hailed his advent as a lecturer on the science on Thursday last, at the above club, with vast pleasure, and we were not disappointed. His subject was the progress of secular music in England [illegible] scribe it, illustrations, by the Misses and Mr. W. Hume, and Mr. Novello, and another vocalist. Sir Henry took a graphic view of all the early secular music of this country, from [illegible] land Blondel., Michael Este, John Benet, an [illegible] through a long list of composers, down to Locke and our immortal Henry Purcell—of whose talent and on whose memory he dwelt with rapture and eloquence. He truly and properly coupled him with Shakspeare and Milton, as one of a triumvirate not excelled in history. The charm of Sir Henry's character was its terseness; there was nothing dragged in for effect. He described the progress of secular music, and called on the vocal assistants to exemplify, and very sweetly the two ladies and the gentleman carried out his object. The madrigals of past days, and the two, three, and four part songs, as they were called two hundred years ago, were admirably sung; many of them were encored. The concert-room was crowded, and the applause enthusiastic.

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAMES'S—FRENCH OPERA COMIQUE.

On Monday evening an attractive bill of fare was offered to the lovers of [illegible] were well calculated to display the talents of the company, although of too slight a character to form the staple commodity of an entire evening's entertainment for a London public, which is apt to look for something more substantial as a piece de resistance. Of the three, not one was wholly and properly coupled but sublimed bravura and hushed bursts of approbation. The music, by Gaveaux, is light and agreeable, and full of pleasing melody, contrasting, in its well-fashioned character, with the later style of Montfort's "Polichinelle," which followed.

The house was well attended; and, on Wednesday evening, crowded to hear "Le Demi-roi Nor," which is listened to with increased pleasure on each succeeding representation.

The only novelty during the week has been at the OLYMPIC theatre, which continues its career of success. A comic drama was produced there on Monday evening, in two acts, called "Brigands in the Bad." The frolics and embarrassments of a party of runaway students, who have assumed the character of bandits, under the guidance of Mrs. Stirling, as their captain, form the principal work of a very amusing piece, and give occasion for some effective scenery and dresses. Mrs Stirling both looked and played charmingly as the brigand chief; and Mr. Compton, disguised as a woman, and then passing himself off as a brigand, was more than ordinarily mirth provoking. The piece, which has some good comic situations in it, was completely successful; and, judging from the effect it produced, is well calculated for the audiences of the theatre, who were loud in their applause.

At the PRINCESS'S a version of an opera, by Hirold, called "Marie, or the Foundling of the Lake," has been produced, but with indifferent success—a circumstance attributable to a want of sufficient care in its production. It was, however, merely mooted as an introduction to the pantomime, which continues its career beyond all comparison the best of the season

Miss Laura Addison will resume her position at the HAYMARKET theatre, which is nightly crowded, in the course of the ensuing week. Mr Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam, it is now settled, will return there forthwith. The representations of the plays performed at Windsor, with nearly the same casts, have proved fortunate hits. The always-popular and always-abused drama of "The Queen's Rose," in which the two chief characters are admirably played by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, has been performed with the great effect during the week.

Some amateur performances [illegible] most deserving of support. Two evenings will be devoted to this purpose in each city; and the pieces of "Richelieu," "The Wreck Ashore," "Used Up," "His First Champagne," and "The Captain of the Watch" will be represented. [illegible] Mr. Bunn's theatre, Drury-lane, on Monday next, [illegible] ety for the Distressed Irish—the Canterbury "Cricket-week" Theatricals—and a vocal gentleman well known and moving in the fashionable circles of the metropolis. The Nobility and Mr. Bunn [illegible] male characters; and the affair is expected to go off with great éclat.

AN EDITOR'S BANQUET.—The editor of the New York Fizzypunch says "Poetry is the flour of literature; prose is the corn, potatoes, and meat; wit is the spice and pepper; love letters are the honey and sugar; and this containing the reminiscences are the apple dumplings."

COUNTRY NEWS.

ALLEGED FELONY BY WEALTHY SILVERSMITHS AT BATH.

A case, which has created great excitement in Bath, and which has, for some days previously, been preparing for investigation by the magistrates of that city, was made the subject of public examination before the police court at the [illegible] place. They had been lodged in gaol, £20,000 but having, it is stated, been released. The charge against them is their having in their possession two silver ladles, having thereupon the mark of the Queen's Company in London, which had been transposed and removed therefrom from some other wares of [illegible] The following evidence was given:—

Mr. Hooch, a [illegible] in the office of the Goldsmiths' hall, stated that on the 30th December last, by direction of the wardens of the Goldsmiths' Company, he went to the shop of Messrs. Warren and Fuller, in Westgate street, Bath. The prisoner Fuller was in the shop. He purchased eleven articles of [illegible] [illegible] tions, and then purchased 34 [illegible] law. On that occasion he saw a silver soup-ladle (No. 6), which was pointed out by Mr. Warren. Saw on the same occasion a great quantity of articles not marked, and also that the mark on the soup ladle was transposed. On the 8th Jan. inst. he went again to the shop of Messrs. Warren and Fuller, under the authority of a search-warrant, and, on that occasion, took away the silver soup-ladle and the silver gilt serving-spoon produced. Found also a great quantity of plate, unmarking, sluggiser, with the ladle and serving-spoon, to 120 ounces which he took away. There was a great quantity of other plate which was [illegible] marked. The plate taken away was [illegible] remarked, except the two articles produced, where it conceived the marks had been transposed. Took the serving-spoon to Goldsmiths' Hall. Has since ascertained that the mark had been transposed and scoured on. The date of the mark on the serving-spoon is 1774. First of all, scraped off the gilt with a piece of emery paper; then warmed it before a lamp with a blowpipe, and then discovered that the following were the whole length of the handle. An assay was made of the bowl, the upper part of the shank, and the handle. The lower part of the shank was not examined, as it bears the mark. The bowl was four pennyweights worse than the standard; the upper part of the shank was three pennyweights worse than the standard; and the handle was one pennyweight better than the standard. The loss of the duty to the Government on the soup-ladle and the serving-spoon is £1 7s. 9d. Has ascertained that the mark on the soup-ladle has been enlarged on. About three inches of the shank had been spliced. Should say that any person in the trade would see where the joinings were made.

J. Rajph said he was an apprentice to Mr. Cousens, a jeweler, working for the jewellers in the town. He worked for Messrs. Warren and Fuller. He had seen the gilt spoon now produced before. When it was first brought to Cousens' shop the handle and bowl were complete. The bowl was not joined to the shank, and the figure was not joined to the shank. It was the same shape it is now. There was a piece put on the shank to make it stouter. The shank was in two pieces when he saw it first; when the first saw it there was the mark upon the one piece, and no mark upon the other. Could see that there had been a piece of [illegible] there, in the upper part. The pieces came from Warren and Fuller's.

H. S. Cousens said he was working jeweler. Had seen the gilt spoon now produced before. It was manufactured for Messrs. Warren and Fuller. The piece which contains the mark was a scower. It was brought to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

RATTLESNAKE AND YOUNG IN THE MENAGERIE OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

RATTLESNAKE AND YOUNG,

AT THE GARDENS OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY, REGENT'S-PARK.

THE Female Rattlesnake and her Brood—which form the subject of Mr. Waterhouse Hawkins's spirited illustration—were presented to the Zoological Society of London by Captain Mackenzie M'Leckie. This gentleman, we are informed, succeeded, during his late visit to Berbice, in obtaining a pair of adult Cascavel Rattlesnakes, of which, however, the male effected his escape before the case containing them was put on board ship. During the voyage homeward, the female produced a brood of nineteen young ones, of which about one-half were a few days since living in the Society's menagerie. We believe that the present instance is the first on record of young Rattlesnakes being seen alive in this country; indeed, the peculiar habits of the adult render their successful treatment in captivity so difficult, that very few examples have survived their importation.

The sound of the rattle, of which so much has been said, and which has given rise to the popular name applied to three or four species of venomous serpents of this form, may be very distinctly heard whenever the attention of the mother is attracted. There appears, at present, to be no indication of it in the young. This very interesting group is well placed in a case of plate glass, which admits of their being observed minutely, and without danger.

Towards the close of 1847, Dr. Wainewright, formerly a captain in the British service, but for the last ten years a physician of eminent standing in New York, met a melancholy death by the bite of a Rattlesnake. The American papers supplied many particulars respecting the singular catastrophe. The snake was about five feet in length, having twelve rattles. It was contained in a box with spars over the top. "The Doctor was on his way home from the ship with the present, but stopped at the Broadway-house to show the curiosity. The company present seemed to enjoy teasing and irritating the snake, while the reptile kept whizzing its rattle at a furious rate. The box was opened; and now there being a fair field, the reptile kept coiling and rearing itself in fierce defiance of its enemies. This display lasted some time; when Dr. Wainewright touched the Snake a few inches below the head, expecting that it could not bend its body sufficiently to bite. In a moment it snapped, and inflicted a wound on the first joint of the middle finger of the right hand." A superficial excision of the part was immediately made, the wound was cauterised with nitrate of sulphur, and a ligature was applied above the wrist. The hand began to swell immediately after the occurrence of the accident; and the poison progressed rapidly in its course to the forearm and arm. But no constitutional symptoms seem to have made their appearance until it reached what the faculty technically termed the "axilla," or armpit; when immediately the pulse began to flag; and, notwithstanding the continual application of stimulants, the pulse never rallied until about 12 o'clock P.M., when death put a period to the doctor's existence.

GRAND BALL AT CHELSEA.

On Monday night the non-commissioned officers of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards gave their Annual Ball to the non-commissioned officers of the 2nd Life Guards, Royal Horse Guards (Blue), 11th Hussars, and Hon. Artillery Company of the City, at the Commercial Hall, King's-road, Chelsea. The dancing was kept up with great spirit until six o'clock next morning, when the company separated, after singing the National Anthem. The band of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards played throughout the evening. The Hall, which is very spacious and richly furnished with large mirrors, was, upon this occasion, decorated with swords, helmets, banners, and other military insignia, supplied by the 1st Life Guards, and when the saloon was filled with company, the splendour of the uniforms and the elegance of the ladies' dresses formed a very brilliant scene. The Ball was well managed; and great credit is due to the stewards, Corporal-Majors Limbert, Roberts, Buckstone, Lyon, Barraud, Jackson, and Dearnly, for their kind attention to the ladies and visitors.

THE CALIFORNIA GOLD MINES.

Letters from California state that further discoveries had been made in the gold region, which yield even a more abundant supply than the previous diggings. According to the latest accounts, the gathering amounted, on the average, to about 100,000 dollars daily, and was constantly increasing, without, apparently, an exhaustion, or any limit to the supply. There was a great amount of distress among the diggers, from the want of the common necessaries of life, and attended with very extensive sickness and mortality. Men loaded with gold appeared like haggard vagabonds, clothed in filthy garments of the meanest kind. To show the value at which liquors are estimated, it is stated that one man, who had two barrels of brandy, sold them at the mines, by the small wineglass, at rates which realised him 14,000 dollars in gold. Everything, and particularly articles of food and raiment, were at most unheard-of prices; for gold was so plentiful in the possession of every one, that it seemed to have lost its value. Daily additions are being made to the numbers employed in digging. No portion of the vast flood of emigration from the United States had arrived. A party of Mormons had collected large quantities of gold in the neighbourhood of the Salt Lake; while on a journey, one of them lost a mule, with 1200 dollars worth of gold on its back. The animal being frightened, ran off in the midst of a vast plain, and was irrretrievably lost.

A person lately returned from the "diggings" states that cattle were plentiful in the country, vegetables generally scarce, and very little fruit. There was a considerable quantity of flour at Sutter's Fort, and large quantities were pouring in. He also says that he has read no account that at all exaggerates either the quantity or quality of the gold. He further states that gold is found in dry ravines, as well as those covered with water.

Persons who collect with any kind of system amass three times the quantity of dust and ore as those who go digging anywhere do. A party of some 20 or 30 were exploring a dry ravine that led to a mountain supposed to be rich with the precious ore; when near its base, they came suddenly upon a spot which glittered with gold-dust and ore, caused by the washings from the mountains. In an instant every man threw himself upon the ground where lay scattered the treasure, and sprawling out his arms and legs, claimed a right to that portion of the earth. The title was regarded by each as good, and the average yield in a short time was upwards of 300 dollars.

Accounts received from Mazatlan inform us that vessels had arrived there from California with gold, some of which had been assayed, and found to average 21 carats. Her Majesty's surveying brig, Pandora, 6, Lieutenant James Wood, Commander, had taken 280,000 dollars' worth in all, and was to land it at Panama, to be sent across the isthmus to Chagres, and by the mail steamers to Southampton.

It is stated in the New York papers that the Government had recently received very late advices from the gold region of such a glowing and glittering character, as even to justify the withholding of particulars from the public.

COST OF THE PASSAGE TO CALIFORNIA.—The cost of getting to San Francisco by the Chagres route, using the mail steamers, is about 375 dollars; say 150 dollars to Chagres, 20 dollars across the isthmus, and 200 dollars from Panama to San Francisco. By taking second-cabin passages, however, the cost will be reduced about 80 dollars; and by taking sailing-vessels instead of steamer to Chagres, the passage may be made for 250 dollars. The voyage via Vera Cruz and Acapulco may probably be made in rather less time, but not cheaper. The passage viâ Panama will probably average 35 days from New York. The distance from Panama to San Francisco is about 3500 miles. The prices of passage in the United States ships from Panama to the ports respectively named on the Pacific coast are as follows:—

		Miles	In State rooms.
Panama to Realejo	.. ..	700	64 dollars
Ditto Acapulco	.. ..	1500	125 ,,
Ditto San Blas	.. ..	2900	175 ,,
Ditto Mazatlan	.. ..
Ditto San Diego	.. ..	3 00	225 ,,
Ditto San Francisco	.. ..	3500	250 ,,

Passage in the lower cabin at a reduction of one-fifth from the above rates. Passage in the forward cabin from Panama to either of the above-named ports, 100 dollars. Pay in advance in all cases.—Washington Union.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

HENRY GEORGES BOULAY (de la Meurthe), who was, on Saturday last, elected to the Vice-Presidency of the French Republic, was born at Nancy, in Lorraine on the 15th of July, 1797.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, M. BOULAY (DE LA MEURTHE).

The new Vice-President is not a man of any distinguished talents, and his election instead of M. Vivien, formerly Minister of Justice and Public Works, and, until the late Revolution, President of the Council of State, is attributed partly to the desire of the Assembly to give a "heavy blow and great discouragement" to the Odillon Barrot Cabinet, whose candidate he was, and partly to a wish to perform an act grateful to the President of the Republic, whose intimate friend he is. M Boulay is a moderate man in political opinion. He lost his election of Colonel of the National Guard of the 11th arrondissement, immediately after the events of February, on account of his frank and courageous declaration that he was not a Republican. M. Boulay was always remarkable for his Bonapartist predilections, and it was he who, year after year, got up petitions to the Chamber to annul the decree of banishment against that family, and, while a deputy, either presented or supported them strenuously when presented by others. M. Boulay declined to attend the great banquet, the precursor of the revolution of February, which was to have been presided over by M. Odillon Barrot.

M. Boulay sits in the National Assembly for La Meurthe, in the Vosges; and is a Member of the Municipal Council of Paris.

GRAND MILITARY BALL AT THE COMMERCIAL HALL, CHELSEA.

KROLL'S WINTER EXHIBITION, AT BERLIN.

KROLL'S WINTER EXHIBITION, AT BERLIN.

"KROLL'S GARDEN" is the Vauxhall of Berlin, with the advantage of being a place of resort in winter as well as summer. The grounds are small, and were enclosed out of the Thier-garten after the pleasure palace, for so it may be called, was built. The exterior of Kroll's establishment has considerable architectural effect, and within is certainly the most complete and magnificent edifice of the kind in Europe. The large saloon, used for concerts, public dinners, and balls, will accommodate three thousand persons seated at table; it runs the whole length of the building, widening in the centre into a large square apartment devoted to dancing, and surrounded by private boxes, a box for the Royal Family, and an orchestra. Throughout the year, somewhat after the same varied character as at Vauxhall, with the addition of lotteries and firing at targets for small prizes. In winter concerts and balls are given almost every night. For the New Year the Great Hall is fitted up in the most gorgeous style as a promenade, with music. This year the scenery of the tropics has been selected, and the whole of the saloon is converted into a palm forest, with creeping plants, snakes, and wild animals in abundance. The orchestra is supported by two elephants, imitating nature in form and colour very successfully. Here the Berliners sip their coffee every evening, and listen to waltzes and overtures, varied by the buffoonery of a puppet theatre; as many as six thousand persons have this year paid for admission in one night. The Engraving shows a section of the centre apartment, with the orchestra.

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER X.—THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF WHITECHAPEL AND BAG-FAIR.

OUR present Engraving represents the picturesque row of butchers' shops at the entrance of Whitechapel. The second house, with the projecting bay-windows, is rich in ornamental detail, and will recal to the reader of history the period when this was the Court end of London, and Royalty resided in the Tower. The Prince of Wales's Feathers, the Arms of Westminster, the Fleur-de-lis of France, and Thistle of Scotland are still standing on the front of this ancient mansion; and it is just possible that the house was once the residence of Prince Henry, son of James the First, as the monogram, yet visible, bears the initials, H. S., surmounted with plumes, which, very probably, stand for Henry Stuart. The Earls of Northumberland, the Throgmortons, and many noble families and wealthy merchants, in former days, resided in this neighbourhood: for, beside the Tower, there was Crosby-place, at no great distance, where the Protector, afterwards Richard the Third, held his court.

How changed is this ancient neighbourhood; the very house in which the Black Prince lodged when he resided in the city had long before Stowe's time been turned into an hostel, and the apartments in which grave councils were held, and where many a glorious victory was planned, echoed back the voice of some Francis, who, amid the clinking of pewter, exclaimed, "Anon, anon, sir," or "Score a pint of bastard in the Half-Moon." The citizens had at that early period flocked into bowering villas in the quarter lacked gardens in which the Percies of old Northumberland "took the pleasure," and where neat pretty Kate, showing her pearly teeth, had no doubt threatened to break the little finger of her own Hotspur, who was too eager to have her dainty lesson, and listen to the wars.

He, also, has long since vanished—the haughty Prior of the Holy Trinity, who, with "hawk and hound" in hand, bestrode his prancing palfrey, and rode, "among the lords," amongst the rich Aldermen of London, proud of his broad domains, which, in those days, extended to the margin of the Thames and over many a fair acre beside those on which Whitechapel now stands. No Earl of Salisbury now goes "sounding" through the city streets, with his long train of five hundred mounted followers, all clad in his household livery, and causing the old shopkeepers to cease their cry of "What do you lack?" while they watched the gay cavalcade, until it was lost, under the low-browed archway that stood before his ancient city mansion, by Dowgate.

Beyond Cornhill and Henry VII. received his ambassadors, and in which the crafty Cecil plotted against Lady Jane Grey, almost before the ink was dry with which he had solemnly registered his name to serve her, has long ago been numbered amongst the things that were; and seldom do the "silver-mailed trumpets," with their "loud acclaim," disturb the peaceful repose of the old city, to announce the in-coming or the out-going of royalty. The archers of Mile-end, with their chains of gold, have departed: the spot on which the tent stood, where bluff Hal regaled himself after having witnessed their sports, is now covered with mean-looking houses;—the poetry of ancient London is gone. The voice of the stream is heard no more, as it wells and babbles below the dwellings of our forefathers, along Aldgate and down Fenchurch-street, and past the door of Sir Thomas Gresham's house, in Lombard-street, until it is doubled round by the Mansion-house and emptied itself into the river. There is still a sound of waters by the Steam-packet Wharf, at London-bridge; but, oh, how different to the "brawling brook" of former days, is the "evil odour" which arises from that poisonous sewer!

Behind London-bridge and around the Tower we find churches and ancient mansions which stood centuries before the Great Fire went reddening and blackening, and destroying every other vestige of the old city; for here alone do we wander through the London which our forefathers rendered so famous; here look upon the grey and time-worn monuments which have preserved their memories. The history of the ancient city has yet to be written; it must be the "pleasant labour" of some one possessed of both talent and leisure. It is a task too great for us to accomplish.

And what have these old-world splendours given place to in this neighbourhood? Splendid gin-shops, plate-glass palaces—into which squalor and misery rush, and drown the remembrance of their wretchedness in drowsy and poisonous potations of gin. Splendour and squalor, the very contrast of which make thinking men pause, but are disregarded by those who contribute to the one, and recklessly endure the other.

The Whitechapel butcher belongs to the old school. He takes a delight in his blue livery, and wears his steel with as much satisfaction as a young ensign does his sword. He neither spurns the worsted leggins nor duck apron; but with bare muscular arms, and knife keen enough to sever the ham-string of an old black bull, takes his stand proudly at the front of his shop, and looks "lovingly" on the well-fed joints that dangle above his head. The gutters before his door literally run with blood: pass by whenever you may, there is the crimson current constantly flowing; and the smell the passenger inhales is not such as may be supposed to have floated over "Araby the blest." A "Whitechapel bird" and a "Whitechapel butcher" were once synonymous phrases, used to denote a character the very reverse of a gentleman; but in the manners of the latter we believe there is a great improvement, and that more than one "knight of the cleaver" who here in the daytime manufacture sheep into mutton chops, keeps his country-house.

The specimens of viands offered for sale in these streets augur well for the strength of the stomachs of the Whitechapel populace: no gentleman of squeamish appetite would like to run the risk of trying one of those out-of-door dinners, which ever stand ready-dressed. The sheeps' trotters look as if they had scarcely had time enough to kick off the dirt before they were potted; and as for the ham, it appears bleached, instead of salted; and to look at the sandwiches, you would think they were veal, or anything except what they are called. As for the fried fish, it resembles coarse red sand-paper; and you would sooner think of purchasing a penny-worth to polish the handle of a cricket-bat or racket, than of trying its qualities in any other way. The black-puddings resemble great fossil ammonites, cut up lengthwise; for while you gaze on them, you cannot help picturing these relics of the early world, and fancying that they must have been found in some sable soil abounding in broken fragments of gypsum, which would account for the fat-like substances inside. What the "faggots" are made of, which form such a popular dish in this neighbourhood, we have yet to learn. We have heard rumours of chopped lights, liver, suet, and onions being used in the manufacturing of these dusky dainties; but he must be a daring man who would convince himself by tasting: for our part, we feel confident that there is a great mystery to be unravelled before the innumerable strata which form these smoking hillocks will ever be made known. The pork-pies which you see in these windows contain no such effeminate morsels as lean meat, but have the appearance of good substantial bladders of lard shoved into a strong crust, from which there was no chance of escape, then sent to the oven and "done brown." The ham and beef houses display the same love of fatness, as if neither pig nor bullock could be over-fed that come to be consumed by the "greasy citizens" of the east end of London.

As for fish! the very oysters gape at you with open mouths, as it they knew how useless it would be to keep closed in such a ravenous-looking neighbourhood. They seem to cast imploring glances at the passers-by, as if begging to be taken out of the hot brine, and devoured as quickly as possible. You see great suspicious-looking wheels, sweltering in little saucers of vinegar; and you cannot help wondering what would be the result if you attempted to eat one; and, while you are thus doubting, without "dusting," some great broad-shouldered fellow comes up, throws down his penny, and, making but one mouthful of the lot, tilts the saucer to his lips, and drains the last crop of vinegar, then goes, for a finisher, into the nearest gin-shop. Pickled eels, cut up into Whitechapel mouthfuls, are faked up from the bottom of great brown jars, and devoured with avidity. You can never pass along without seeing brewers' drays unloading somewhere in the streets; and you cannot help thinking what hundreds a year Barclay and Perkins might save, in the wear and tear of men and horses, if they laid down pipes all the way from their brewery in the Borough to Whitechapel.

What little taste they display (if we may make use of so classical a phrase in contra-distinction to their "palatal" or gastronomic propensities), is shown in their love of pigeon-keeping, and rearing of "fancies." In this district of the metropolis pigeon-keeping has a choice and an extensive stock of these beautiful birds. From this taste arises good results, inasmuch as it leads them into the suburbs, especially on Sundays, when they either carry the pigeons with them in bags or throw into their coat-pockets, and so wander for three or four miles out, when they turn the birds loose, both parties thus enjoying the luxury of a little fresh air. They are excellent hands at decoying pigeons, for all the "strays" that alight in the neighbourhood are pretty sure to become "Whitechapel birds." What means they use for entrapping these feathered favourites we have not been able to ascertain, though one knowing fellow told us with a deep-meaning wink that "it was the fineness of the climate, and a little 'hanky-panky' business." We paid a pot of beer for the information, without asking for any clearer definition of the latter phrase.

Having thus become enlightened in the art of pigeon-stealing, we turned up Houndsditch, and visited Rag Fair. The price of admission is "von halfpenny," a toll from which neither Jew nor Gentile are exempt. This market or fair for old rubbish of every description is well worth seeing; and to whatever use the trash could be turned that met our eye in every direction, did at first, as old Pepys says, "puzzle me" to find out.

"Rag Fair consists of long rows of standing or sitting places, having neither back nor front, but covered in by narrow pent-house roofs, supported on beams, under which the sellers or exchangers take their places: the wind and rain blow and beat through these open sheds, both drenching and sweetening the dusty rags that are exposed for sale. Those who wish to purchase pass up and down the "ragged" alleys. We were detained at the narrow entrance of the first row for several moments by two ancient and bearded children of Israel, who were endeavouring to bargain. The seller had the portions of two pairs of old shoes in his hand; one pair "soleless," the other nearly "upperless."

"How much for those, Mo'?" enquired the purchaser.

"Twopence," answered the other; "they be dirt cheap.

"Bah!—won't do, Mo'," was the reply, after having examined them; "could not cut off enough to stop up a mouse-hole. Say von penny!"

"Vell, den, three-halfpence!"

We passed on, and did not witness the close of the bargain, our ears being now assailed with such cries as "Who vants three waistcoats for old coat?" "Who vants old hats for old shoes?" "Two shirts for von pair of strong breeches!" and so on. There we again saw the hook-nosed, large-eyed collector of "old clo'" whom we had that very morning stopped to look at, while he carried off a whole suit in exchange for two geraniums, which looked as if they would not live a week. The very things he was then running down, as he pointed out every thin spot and speck of grease to the little Cinderella he was bargaining with in the Borough, he was now extolling, and vowing that they had but been worn "werry lestle, werry lestle, indeed." With keen eye the intended purchaser traversed every inch; examined carefully the knees of the trowsers, the arm-pits, elbows, and sleeves of the coat; then discovering something at last, as he shim'd it before the light, he pointed to the spot, and looked at the other in silence. "Vell, vot of dat? Look at the pryshe!" was the reply of the gesticulating exchanger.

There is an old and mouldy smell about the place, telling that dank and fetid corners have been rummaged out, to contribute to the stock of filth there accumulated. And yet, through the dirty mass, the eye may here and there detect the fragments of finer articles, which, in days when the former owners would now run exclaiming with Hamlet, "And smelt so? Pah!" Small satin slippers, which had once been white, but now wore a little of the hue of every foul thing they had come in contact with. The velvet-cut-velvets, once a heap of gaudy dyes, are all but sunk beside the thread-bare blackness of the poor widow's cast-off weeds. One might almost fancy that Pride had come here to crawl out of its shabby habiliments, and gone and laid down in some of the dark alleys in the neighbourhood to die, having "shuffled off" the last vestiges of respectability.

To what vile purposes does it come at last!

Rags that may have touched a young and beautiful Duchess, not now fit for dusters. A remnant of the dress-coat of some young Lord, thrown down with disdain by the hunger-bitten jobbing tailor, because he cannot get a patch out of it large enough to seat the "reconstructions" of the Whitechapel hawker. Rag Fair is indeed the great grave-yard of Fashion; the last cemetery to which cast-off clothes are borne before they enter upon another state of existence, and are spirited into dusters and dish-clouts.

EMIGRATION TO SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—In consequence of the great number of candidates for emigration who have for some time past literally thronged the residence of Colonel Gawler, in Derby, seeking information respecting the above colony, the gallant Colonel at length intimated he would take an early opportunity of giving them a familiar lecture on the subject, with advice as to the voyage and other particulars. Accordingly, on Monday evening last, although the ordinary means of publicity had not been given of the lecture, the school room connected with St John's Church, in that town, was crowded with more than two hundred respectable operatives, and other persons, with their wives and grown-up children, who listened with deep interest and attention to the information thus given; the facts and statements being the more valuable as the result of Colonel Gawler's personal and official experience from a long residence in South Australia as the Governor of that colony. The lecture was illustrated by maps, and the physical, commercial, moral, and social aspects and advantages of the country were well explained in a clear and intelligible manner. Colonel Gawler concluded his observations by some excellent advice as to the cultivation of habits of industry, temperance, economy, and religion, as the sure and certain means of happiness, prosperity, and success in such a country—sentiments that seemed to carry conviction to every bosom, as was evinced by frequent interruptions of applause. At the close of the lecture, Mr. J. Jones rose to propose a vote of thanks to Colonel Gawler, congratulating those present on the treat they had enjoyed; and he hoped neither the instruction gained, nor the advice given, would be forgotten. He (Mr Jones) might take the opportunity of stating, that, in a well-known publication, called "Chambers' Information for the People," (the edition of 1842), under the article "South Australia," they would find an extract from a speech of Colonel Gawler's, delivered there in 1840, when governor. From that excellent speech, deliver d more than eight years ago, it must be no less gratifying to Col. Gawler than to every person present to learn, that the resources of that colony, combining, as it was then affirmed, the elements of great prosperity, had been from year to year gradually developing themselves, so that now South Australia was the most interesting country that engaged the attention of emigrants. The vote having been unanimously carried, another speaker rose to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Gawler, for the kind and lucky-like spirit she had shown in furthering the wishes and intentions of those who were about to emigrate. This was received with great applause, and the company immediately rose from their seats to testify their unanimous respect and gratitude for Mr. [illegible] which she had proposed. Colonel Gawler, on being [illegible] Andover Advertiser.

A MINE UNDERGROUND FOR SEVEN DAYS WITHOUT FOOD.—A miner named John Edwards, 20 years old, employed at the [illegible] pit, in the Rhondda valley, was on Tuesday week brought out of the level on [illegible] he had [illegible] Wednesday morning in the following manner. A party of his fellow-miners went in search of him. They found him some distance from the workings. His feet were blistered by walking to and fro endeavouring to find his way out; and he was in that dreary and unwholesome place without having anything to eat or drink for that long period. He is in a fair way of recovery. He lost his light, and had no matches with him.

The official Customs return just issued of the exports from the port of Southampton for the past year shows, as compared with the two preceding years, a large and steady augmentation of the trade of that place, the increase being more striking when the recent depression of trade is taken into account. The declared value of the exports for 1846 was £2,196,289; for 1847, £2,627,594; and for 1848, £3,216,697.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE publication of the weights for the great Spring Handicaps absorbed all the sporting interest of the week; for not only was the speculation on them watched for itself, but for the influence it would have upon the acceptances. With a few exceptions, the averages have been struck with singular concord. The most notable difference is a three pounds Lambswold, a three year old colt, now 7st 4lb, put on him for the Chester Cup, and set for the Newmarket Handicap. He started but once last year, and, carrying 5st, won the Members' Plate at Malton, beating a field of four. Another lucky Chester Cup was of course the cynosure of the "Corner." Four nominations viz. Bleacher, Ion, Cetirese, Ellerslie, and Farewell almost monopolised the betting—the first and last representing the Irish party. Bleacher, sagely backed at twenty-five to one, ran nine times last season in Ireland—four times as a winner. His last race—for the Curragh Casserwine—which he won, showed that he can get the Chester course and distance, two years and a quarter. Farewell has raced twice, and was beaten on both occasions. Of old inheritors, it need only be observed that her Chester weight is 8st 6lbs. Ellerslie carries 7st; he won two races out of the last five he ran last year, one of them the Column, for which 9st weight was 6st 4lbs. The Great Metropolitan Stakes were not in much force. Lugar and Canezou were the best fancied. The former started once last year, and ran last in a field of five. His weight is 4st 10lbs. The latter was the second best of her year that 1848 produced, and has to carry 8st 11lb, should she come to the post. But "there's the rub." Canezou has certainly had as a rule to [illegible] when the public "got on" before the party, to [illegible] the nomination so forestalled, and then put the over-anxious [illegible] hole." Some owners of race-horses, indeed, offer the offenders an alternative, which is, to lay them a hundred per cent. more than the market per centage, in most cases, worse than the disease. It must be had in mind that the acceptances for these handicaps, which are to be declared on or before the 1st of February, will be influenced far more by the state of the accounts than the flattering unction of the weight.

The ruggedness of the odds on Steaple-Chasing, as ruled at Tattersall's, prove the established popularity of the sport. The fixtures of six-and-twenty meetings, between the 1st of February and the 21st of April, are already announced; and these, and the many "extra" ones, will offer very many additions South Steeple-chase takes place on Thursday next. The Open Stakes closed with sixteen acceptances. Proceed at the top, with 11st 4lbs, to carry. In addition to the "public" race, there is a second as free handicap, so that a day's sport may be reckoned on.

The coming week will be rich in Coursing. The Everley (Wilts) Meeting commences on Monday; the meetings at Hewsill and Middleham on Wednesday. Southport also begins on the latter day. The lovers of the leash have had a fine open season of it so far, and hares have been abundant. February will be Carnival of the long-tails commences with the Ashdown Club Meeting, on the 5th proximo, and promises a brilliant catalogue of sport. In addition to the announcement of the day on which a coursing meeting will fall, no other particulars of stake will be run, the hour at which the nominations are required to be in the slips should also be made public. The time for starting every race is given in the programme of a race meeting, and the importance to which coursing has attained calls for a similar attention to its details.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The Chester Cup betting, a though confined to a select few, was highly important; Bleacher, Ither tress, Ellerslie, and one or two others, having been backed with great spirit, and with a corresponding effect on the quotations. It was not less interesting on the Metrop litan Handicap, [illegible] having a host of supporters at half the odds laid before the weights came out

SLAVE ABDUCTOR CONVICTED.—In Ireland, Alpha Cottage Court, in Centreville, Md., lately, the trial of W. I. Work, for assisting certain slaves from Ireland to run away (and which was removed from that county), resulted in a verdict of guilty after forty minutes' deliberation. Sentence Tuesday, one p.m. on Friday. The Centreville Times says: "Work has been sentenced in the three cases concluded in Queen Anne's County Court, to the penitentiary for terms imprisonment in the aggregate. He will be sentenced on the two cases tried in Easton, at the adjourned court, to about eight years more, making in all 18 years."

THE AMERICAN PRESS.—One thing rejoices us greatly, that we can send our newspapers and periodicals cheaply to your country. Our editors begin to talk of the English circulation. Look out for some "hall specimens" of newspapers. We have here at last three penny papers published in the far west, where ink and paper are so cheap. The types are bleasoned with hog meat, and the journal is printed on [illegible] and sends it back in time for the next number. We do not, of course, [illegible] pate the circulation of such newspapers in England.—New York Correspondence of a Contemporary

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Consols register an advance of one per cent. upon last week's prices. The absence of any disturbing news from the Continent, and more particularly the abundance of money, tend to this result. On Monday Consols opened at 89¾ to 90¼; advanced on Tuesday to 90¾ afterwards yielding a point to money sales, at which they remained on the 30th inst. On Thursday were done at 91 [illegible] Wednesday was not, however, maintained to the full extent, upon its transpiring that the weekly meeting of the Directors of the Bank of England had [illegible] the minimum rate of discount at 2½ per cent. The above quotation is anticipated. The Market closed, however, with much firmness, everything for the moment favouring the party for the rise. The unfunded debt continues to improve, and India Bonds are steadily held at previous quotations. Quarter per Cents have, in consequence of some very large exchanges from Consols, attained the relative value. At the close of the week there was a slight tendency to resisting prices quoting, for Bank Stock, 211; Reduced, 90¾; Consols, 90¾; 3 per Cent. Annuities, 1726, 88⅝; New 3½ per Cent. Although the Foreign Market has been tolerably active, the principal business has been in Mexican, Peruvian, Portuguese, and Grenada. Mexican improved from Monday's price, of 26¼, to 27 on Tuesday, but experienced a slight reaction on Wednesday, in consequence of a rumour that the next remittance on account of dividends will not exceed 2660 dollars. Portuguese Four per Cents, after advancing to 27, have receded to 26¾, principally from realising. Grenada Bonds have been speculated in to some extent, upon the hope that Grenada will follow the example of the other South American Republics, and re-arrange its debt. Peruvian continues firm. The market was a little flatter towards the close of the week, prices closing as follows: Austrian, Five per Cent., 79¾. Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cent., 21. Chilian, Six per Cent., 87. Danish Bonds, 84; Grenada Bonds, One per Cent., 15¼; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1846, 26¾; Ditto, Deferred, 9¼; Portuguese, 72; Ditto, Four per Cent., Account, 27¼; Spanish, Five per Cent., 1840, Account, 19⅝; Ditto, Passive, 3¾; Ditto, Account, 28¾; Belgian, Four-and-a-Half per Cent., 79¼; Dutch, Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 12 Gilt, Account, 49¼; Ditto, Four per Cent., 92¼.

Shares in the divisional railway lines continue firm, with a tendency to advance. London and North Western have touched 130¾; and Midlands, Great Westerns, Eastern Counties, and South Eastern and Dovers nearly held previous quotations. On the whole, the demand has ruled steady for most descriptions of grain, and the late rates have been fully supported this at foreign wheats, free of duty, have sold to a fair extent, at full prices; but all other kinds have been neglected. THE INSCRIPTION ON THE PAVEMENT.—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

THE INSCRIPTION ON THE PAVEMENT.

'Tis sad, poor scribbler of the flags,
To leave thee there in thy distress;
To look unmoved upon thy rags,
More eloquent than nakedness;
To leave thee in the wind and rain—
To steel the heart, avert the eye:
But, yet, thou tell'st thy tale in vain;
I can but grieve, and pass thee by.

Though harsh it seem to such as thou,
Our English law is wise and good.
If to the starving we allow Protection, shelter, clothes, and food—
If heavy tax, ungrudged, we pay
To keep the beggar from the street—
What right hast thou to block the way,
And vend thy squalor at our feet?

'Tis easy, doubtless, to efface
Unpleasant thoughts, or rising qualms,
By giving, to forget thy case,
The lazy tribute of our alms;
But is it just, while widows grieve
Or orphan babes in secret pine,
To let them die, while we relieve
Such importunity as thine?

And surely, if thine art can spell
Thy sufferings to the public view,
Thy hand can pull the workhouse bell
To ask the parish for thy due?
Though cold my words, their truth remains—
My judgment dictates the reply;
I give thee nothing for thy pains,
I pity—but I pass thee by.

And yet, God knows, I do not grudge
To share my little with the poor,
And many a weary mile I'd trudge
To help the needy—were I sure.
I'd part my shillings or my crusts
With misery in her secret cells;
But clamorous beggary disgusts—
Theatric nakedness repels.

THAMES CHAMPIONSHIP INSIGNIA.

THE honorary distinction which we have here engraved is to be hereafter worn by those amateur rowers on the Thames who have held the "silver sculls;" the victory conferring upon the holder the title of "Champion of the Thames." In the decoration, the wreath is green enamel; the sculls are of silver; the clasps gilt (each clasp signifying the year of victory); and the ribbon dark blue.

This boat-race was established in the year 1830, when a well-known amateur rower, in consequence of the dearth in sculling-matches, and with a view to encourage the art, presented, for competition, a pair of small model silver sculls (symbolical of the Championship), enclosed in a case bearing this inscription:—"These Sculls were, in the year 1830, presented by Henry C. Wingfield to the Amateur Scullers on the Thames, to be held by the Best for the time being, on condition of his rowing at half flood from Westminster to Putney, against all Challengers, annually, on the 10th day of August, for Ever." The prize has since been annually contested by the best amateurs, and the contest has produced excellent sport—the distance, five miles and a half, severely testing the condition, strength, and dexterity of the competitors. In consequence of the inconvenience arising from steam-boats, this, the last, important match on the old water from Westminster to Putney has just been changed for Putney to Kew; and it was considered a desirable opportunity to confer on the champion of so important a race a more lasting memento than that previously granted to him (which was merely the engraving his name and the year of victory on a silver plate attached to the box including the sculls; and which, being given up to, and held by, each successful competitor, afforded the ex-champion no memorial of his past prowess), in the shape of honorary insignia, or mark of distinction; whilst it was also thought that the right to such a distinction would materially tend to increase the public interest in the match. Hence the annexed 'Order of Merit."

ORDINATION.—The Lord Bishop of Manchester held an ordination at the Cathedral church on Sunday last, when twelve deacons and three priests were admitted into holy orders. The ordination sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Wray.

BRISTOL CATHEDRAL.—About a month since, the Dean and Chapter of Bristol Cathedral issued an order for the discontinuance of the practice of chanting or intoning the service. This unprecedented act was the instant occasion of great excitement on the part of the congregation, who felt deeply hurt at the change, and expressed themselves on every occasion with great earnestness, but without the indulgence of any intemperate language. Finding all remonstrance vain, a number of the lay congregation who usually attend divine worship in the Cathedral have addressed a memorial to the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, praying for his interference, as visitor, and which memorial has been presented to his Lordship by the High Sheriff of the County and Mayor of the City, who acted as a deputation for the memorialists. After expressing the profoundest respect for the office, as well as for the personal character of the Bishop, and their pain at the "sudden interruption of the immemorial manner of conducting divine worship in our Cathedral," the memorialists proceed to say: "We reckon among the best portions of our inheritance, as English Churchmen, the privilege of partaking in that sublime and uprising service, for whose dignified and coherent performance such ample provision has been made. We hold that we, and all who by our common nature are attuned for that service in its perfect beauty, are as much entitled to enjoy it as others are entitled to the stalls which give them this seeming, but not lawful power to deform it." The interference of his Lordship is requested "to reconcile a divided Master and a dejected flock." This, as visitor, the memorialists say the Bishop is enabled to do by the statutes which govern the chapter. The deputation was most courteously received by the Bishop, who, after hearing the memorial read, made the following reply:—"Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen: I beg to express my sense of the honour done to me by this deputation, and to assure you that if I am statutably called upon to exercise jurisdiction in the matter of this memorial, I shall give the subject all the attention in my power, with a hope that, by the blessing of God, I shall come to a sound decision."

SUBDIVISION OF LARGE PARISHES.—A bill has been prepared to be introduced into Parliament early in the ensuing session for the subdivision of large parishes. After reciting the various acts which have been passed relative to the building and promoting the building of additional churches in large parishes, it proposes to make all the churches and chapels that either have been or shall be built, together with their districts, distinct parish churches and new parishes. Marriages, baptisms, and burials are to be celebrated therein, and the lawfully appointed fees for those ceremonies and Easter offerings and dues to be received by the incumbent. All persons residing within the new parish must be married at the church of such parish, and not elsewhere. The incumbent of the new parishes are to be bodies corporate, and have perpetual succession. They are to have the exclusive cure of souls within their parishes, and are in no respect to be under the control of the rector or vicar of the parish from which the new parish is to be taken. The new parish is also to be exempt from all charges necessary for the repair of the old parish church; and by another clause, all Easter offerings and dues may be commuted for a sum of money, which is to be invested in the purchase of land, glebe, tithe, &c. The above are the most important clauses. There is one provision of the bill, however, which is manifestly unjust, inasmuch as it proposes that the provisions of the Act shall take place immediately; and thus, without any compensation, takes away from existing incumbents all the emoluments which they at present enjoy from the districts which are to be made. No such provision should be made without the consent of the present incumbent, or take place after his death.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE GEORGE INN, NORTON ST. PHILIP'S, SOMERSET.

FROM a granary to an inn is no very startling change in appropriation, and such is the history in little of the monastic building before us; reminding us of the times when the hostel was a place of greater importance than in the present railway age, and when the innkeeper was invariably a man of substance.

The ancient edifice before us was formerly a granary belonging to Hinton Abbey, in the village of Norton St. Philip's, between Bath and Frome. It has been greatly disfigured by modern hands, but there is much left of its middle-age art; its capacious porch, the designs of some of its windows, and its overhanging upper stories (upon rude corbels), and its inner gallery leading to what once were bed-chambers, all denote the pile to have been erected in the early portion of the fifteenth century. We miss "the windpipes of hospitality," as chimneys have been happily styled; but we must recollect that they were not requisite in the original appropriation of the structure, and therefore did not form a feature of the original design. At the point of each gable is a small campanile or bell-tower, of some architectural beauty, which makes us regret that the building has not been preserved more intact, or has not attracted the attention of restorers.

In the town of Norton St. Philip's was formerly held the most noted cloth fair in the west of England; and the large upper room of the George Inn was the exchange or place of assembling for the merchants attending this great mart.

Somersetshire, it will be recollected, was the principal scene of Monmouth's rebellion against James II.; and it was at Norton St. Philip's that the ill-fated Duke was attacked, on June 27, 1685, by the Royalists, whose advanced guard had marched from Bath, under the Duke of Grafton, Monmouth's half-brother. Colonel Holmes, who was at the head of Monmouth's army, had an arm nearly shot off in the engagement; and it is related that the brave soldier, unassisted, completed the amputation with the cook's knife in the kitchen of the George Inn. The large projecting window lights the apartment wherein James slept on the night of the above battle; and the room is to this day known as "the King's Chamber."

THE GEORGE INN, NORTON ST. PHILIP'S, SOMERSET.

The adjoining house, too, has its historic record. In this humble dwelling, though it has a bell-tower like its massive neighbour, was born the late Mr. Rundell, the wealthy goldsmith, of Ludgate-hill, who furnished the crown and table of many a Sovereign, and died a millionaire.

CHRIST CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, BERMONDSEY.

THESE Schools, which have just been completed, are erected immediately adjoining the new church belonging to the district of Christ Church, situate at the corner of Parkin's-row and the Neckinger-road. The material is chiefly brick; and the style of architecture designed to harmonise with the church, which is Romanesque: the whole group has a pleasing effect.

The two upper stories of the front part of the building are arranged as residences for a master and mistress; the remaining portion being divided into appropriate class-rooms for 300 children. Under the residences is an open cloister for the use of the children, through which is the girl's entrance; that for the boys being in the rear, in Thomas-street.

W. Bennett Hays, Esq., is the architect; and Mr. Benjamin Wells, of Bermondsey, the builder. The Schools cost £1100. The principal part of this sum was provided by the Southwark Fund for Building Churches, &c.; the remainder by a grant from the National Society, and from local subscription.

The Church was consecrated on the 19th of June last by the Lord Bishop of Winchester. It contains accommodation for 970 persons, and cost £4970. The Rev. R. Marshall Martin is the incumbent of the district, whose exertions have been mainly instrumental towards the completion of these buildings.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 356.—Vol. XIV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1849. [Sixpence.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

While nearly all the old forms have been changed in the principal countries of Continental Europe, since the Session of the British Parliament was last opened, nothing has been changed in this. Our Constitution has remained intact, while all around it has been crumbling into decay. It has defied all internal shocks—if any can be said to have menaced it. The external commotions of the Continent have stopped at the opposite coasts of Albion, and have not penetrated to our shores. Again the British Legislature has resumed its sittings in its ancient locality, and again the machinery of our system is in full and harmonious operation.

The Session has opened under somewhat remarkable circumstances. The old Corn-Law expired on Wednesday. The Session of Parliament commenced on Thursday. On the former day, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and all the prominent members and friends of the late Anti-Corn-Law League, met together in Manchester, and, in the face of assembled thousands, celebrated their past victory. On Thursday the Royal Speech was delivered to both Houses of Parliament; and the first day of Free Trade in corn was inaugurated by the solemn opening of the great Legislative Assembly of the nation. We place the two facts together, as they serve to illustrate each other.

The Royal Speech, as a matter of course, foreshadowed, rather than actually announced, the business of the Session; but it told sufficient to enlighten us on the intended policy of the Ministry on the two great questions that are likely to monopolise the attention of Parliament—Financial Reform and the state of Ireland. The old Anti-Corn-Law Leaguers expatiated, as they could not well avoid doing, upon the merits of Free Trade: they praised their own past exertions, exalted their own victory, and indulged in sanguine anticipations of benefits yet to result from the free commercial intercourse of nations. But another subject had even larger possession of their minds: Economical Reform was the strong under-current of their speeches; and all the glorification about the past served but to illustrate the new demand which their leaders have made. The same idea peeps through the vague phraseology of the Royal Speech. The Leaguers, in their new character, have undertaken to speak for the public. The Ministers, in the Royal Speech, have spoken both for the public and for themselves. The same sentiment pervades both. We find that the principle contended for by the irresponsible agitators out of power is conceded by the responsible Ministers in power, and that the difference between the two is one of degree only. We may, therefore, expect that the Session will not pass over without something being done. We trust that, if it do not meet the demands of those who have fixed upon an arbitrary reduction, it will be sufficient to satisfy the reasonable wishes of the great bulk of the tax-paying community. In fact, if we may rely upon the reports of those who are believed to have the confidence of the Ministers, Lord John Russell is ready to take the wind out of the sails of agitation by a large concession. We are told that a reduction of at least four millions can be accomplished, and that, after such a reduction, there will be a surplus in the National Exchequer at the end of the year. The country knows to whom it should give the principal credit for this result. If any credit at all be due to the Whig Ministry, it is simply that of having known how to yield; of having slid out of a false and untenable position with ease and dexterity; and of having conceded before concession became ungracious, and before agitation attained a height which would have emboldened it to make demands of a nature not quite so pleasant or so safe to insist upon as a solvent balance-sheet.

The next great question is that of Ireland. The events on the Continent have thrown in the background many questions that formerly appeared urgent. All questions of organic reforms have fallen into disrepute. There is an end, for a time, to the idea of new Reform Bills—the Charter is all but defunct—the Ballot is suffering under an eclipse—the Extension of the Suffrage is shelved; but the howl of Irish misery swells upon our ears, and will be listened to. No Continental revolutions, no fall of Empires can still it, even for a moment. The spectacle of our brother's degradation and suffering forces itself upon us. It may not be agreeable; but there it is, and we must look at it. It insists not alone upon being seen and pitied, but upon being relieved and remedied. This will be the difficulty of 1849, as it has been that of all previous sessions within the memory of this generation. There will, however, be this difference, that it never before was so fearfully urgent as it is now—never so perplexing to meet—never so perilous to neglect.

These two great subjects, together with the Bill for the Repeal of the Navigation Laws, and that for the admission of Jews to Parliament, and all the other bantlings of Legislation abandoned last year by Minsters, and to be taken up in the present Session, will, of themselves, give our lawmakers enough to do. In addition to these, there are so many errors of a bygone legislation to be remedied; so many practical abuses to be considered; so many theoretical anomalies and grievances that clamour for an audience, and that will not be utterly silenced; and so many social reforms, both on points of minor and major interest, to be debated, that we may expect a Session of more than average interest and importance.

But, amid all this turmoil, one question, more urgent than any except the Irish difficulty, will, most likely, stand no chance of being listened to. The Education of the People—the most important of all questions to the future well-being of this country, and to the maintenance, not alone of our constitution, the envy and the model of nations, but perhaps to our very existence forty or fifty years hence as an independent State—must, we fear, stand over till quieter times. Now and then, the veil which shrouds from our comfortable eyes the horrible degradation of the multitudinous swarms of young children that are growing up in vice and ignorance, to take the place of the present generation of men and women, is filled up, and society is appalled at the spectacle. Nothing, however, is done, in spite of repeated warning. The great evil of ten or a dozen years hence has fewer terrors for us than the smaller evil of to-day. So we go on callously in the old course. When we feel no present evil, we are not very much alarmed at the future. When trade and manufactures flourish, we hear but little of the consequent pressure upon the realised property of the country; but when stagnation of industry ensues—and come it must at periodic intervals, as long as machinery and capital have a tendency to produce faster than the wants of the world increase—a spasmodic effort is made to do something for the overabundant poor and for the frightful multitudes of young children that are growing up in sin and misery.

Yet nothing effectual is done. Population presses upon resources; and, in this old, experienced, and wise country, we are content to let this pressing population be an ignorant one. This is the great danger. It may be far ahead, or it may be nearer than we suppose. But it is a danger which requires immediate handling. "The evil principle and the good," says the Edinburgh Review, "would seem to be contending within our land for victory. In this contest every other is involved. Let the friends of order, of education, of religion, look to it. There is plainly not a moment to lose." We do not agree in all the philosophy of our ministerial contemporary, but we re-echo his warning. There is, indeed, not a moment to lose, if, in the inevitable struggle for subsistence, which will, sooner or later, take place in this densely peopled country, the next generation is not better instructed than the present. The Irish question is a great one, but the question of English pauperism and ignorance is far greater in its probable influence upon the fortunes of humanity.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The comparative tranquillity which has prevailed for some time past amongst our restless neighbours has been disturbed this week with something like a compensating force making up for the past calm.

The causes of commotion have been numerous. We will present them seriatim in the order of their occurrence.

M. Léon Faucher, the Minister of the Interior, having introduced a bill for the suppression of clubs, demanded to have it considered d'urgence; in other words, to have the standing orders of the House suspended, in order that the measure might be at once passed. The bill, which was of a highly penal character, was as follows:—

"Art. 1. Clubs are interdicted. Every meeting, held periodically or at irregular intervals, for the discussion of public affairs, shall be considered as a club.

"Art. 2. The presidents, chiefs, secretaries, &c., of such meetings shall be condemned to a fine of from 100f. to 500f., to deprivation of civil rights during a year at least and three years at most, independently of the other penalties they may have incurred.

"Art. 3. Individuals who shall lend their houses or apartments for such meetings shall be sentenced to a fine of from 100f. to 500f.

"Art. 4. All the provisions of the law of 28th July last, relative to clubs, are abrogated."

M. Faucher, in introducing the measure, read the exposé de motifs which had induced the Government to bring it forward. This document declared that in the Clubs anarchy was organised, with its regular staff, its discipline, and its tribune; that it raised its voice in opposition to that of the State, as represented in the National Assembly, and tumultuous among the public streets of irritation and mutual hatred, which end in confusion and bloodshed. It moreover declared that the Clubs, so far from absorbing the force of the revolutionists, were nothing more nor less than the nucleus of secret societies, and that behind these tumultuous assemblages there were secret bodies and dark intrigues, to which the public meetings were a mere cloak. On these grounds M. Faucher justified the bill, and asked the Assembly to sanction it.

The question of "urgency" was referred by the Assembly to a committee, which on Saturday reported against the demand of "urgency."

The member who drew up the report of the committee was M. Sénard, the President of the National Assembly during the insurrection of June, and the Minister of the Interior under General Cavaignac. In his report, M. Sénard declared that the committee proposed the rejection of the "urgency," because it did not approve of the principles of the bill itself. It was not, he said, the tutelary regulation of a right exercised by the Constitution that was demanded: it was not the repression of abuse by the imposition of penalties, or even by temporary suspension, it was the right itself that was contested; for the exposé des motifs frankly declared that the Minister of the Interior demanded that the whole pith of the measure was in the words "the clubs are prohibited." However much the disorders which had resulted from the clubs might be deplored, and however anxious the majority might be to put an end to them, the committee could not accept a measure which would have the effect of annulling a right consecrated by the Constitution. So far the report was opposed to the principles of the bill. As regarded the urgency of the measure, M. Sénard also declared that the explanations given by the Minister of the Interior did not justify the necessity, as it appeared that the clubs, instead of increasing, were rapidly diminishing. On the 26th of July, when the decree regulating the clubs was passed, there were 37 clubs existing in Paris, while at the present day there were only 11; and of these five had been closed within the last few days by judiciary decisions. He therefore thought that there were no grounds for urgency; but that, on the contrary, if the Assembly should think fit ultimately to adopt the measure, it ought to do so after solemnly considering the question, with all the usual forms and guarantees. This report was confirmed by the Assembly, on a division, by a majority of 418 to 349—a heavy blow to the cabinet of M. Odillon Barrot.

The journals were of course greatly divided on the question, the Presse and the Débats strongly advocating the bill, while the National and others forcibly opposed it. The National pretty clearly showed that the measure was altogether unconstitutional, by placing the text clause of M. Faucher's bill, and the 8th article of the Constitution, which was passed two months ago, in juxta-position as follows:—

"ART. VIII. OF THE CONSTITUTION	"CLAUSE I. OF M. L. FAUCHER'S
"The citizens have the right of associating together, of assembling peaceably and without arms, of petitioning, or manifesting their ideas by the way of the press or otherwise; the exercise of these rights has no other limits but the rights or the liberty of others, and the public security."	"Clubs are prohibited. Will be considered as such, every meeting which shall be held periodically, or at irregular intervals, for the discussion of public affairs."

"It is," observed that journal truly enough, "the right of meeting, of which the violation by the old Government produced the Revolution of February, that is now violated by this Revolution itself, or rather by the Ministry of the counter Revolution."

Immediately after the above-mentioned vote of the Assembly, M. Ledru-Rollin mounted the tribune, and presented the following proposition, signed by forty-eight members of the Mountain, for the impeachment of the Ministry:

"Considering that the anti-Republican policy of the Ministry has just manifested itself by a fact which attacks the liberty of the press, and others forcibly opposed it. The National pretty clearly showed that the measure was altogether unconstitutional, by placing the text clause of M. Faucher's bill, and the 8th article of the Constitution, which was passed two months ago, in juxta-position as follows:—

"Considering that the right of meeting is a natural right, and a political right written and consecrated in the constitution of the French Republic:

"Considering that, by the project of law presented yesterday, the 29th of January, for the suppression of the clubs, the Ministry have rendered themselves guilty of an act which is a flagrant violation of Articles 8 and 84 of the Constitution:—

"Considering that the Ministry is responsible for its acts, according to Article 68 of the Constitution, the undersigned representatives of the people demand the immediate impeachment of the Ministers, and their trial before the High Court of the Nation, to be there judged in conformity with Article 91 of the Constitution."

Besides the above, the Ministry received two other severe checks in the course of the sitting of Saturday. The one was the presentation of the report of the committee on M. Billault's motion, the object of which was to ask the Assembly to pass the budget of receipts before the budget of expenses a motion which, at the hands of a body so much opposed to the Ministry as the National Assembly, would have the effect of exposing the public service to complete disorganization. The report was in favour of M. Billault's proposition. The other check was with respect to the organization of the Council of State, which the Assembly resolved should be elected by itself, instead of by the Legislative Assembly, which is to succeed the present Constituent Assembly, as was originally proposed by the Government.

While the business glanced at above was transacted in the Assembly, the court of the Chamber, outside, was crowded by troops under arms, gardiens de Paris, &c., who were endeavouring to disperse a mixed crowd of workmen and students—the latter, to the number of 900, having come to present a petition to the President of the Assembly, praying that M. Lerminier, who had become obnoxious to them, might not be reinstated as Professor of History in the College of France. The students had previously gone to the office of the Democratie Pacifique, and presented a similar protest. Their arrival was attended by some disorder, and several of them were arrested. In their passage along the streets, from the College of France to the Rue de Beaune, where the office of the Democratie Pacifique is situated, they several times set up the cry of "A bas Failloux!" Their petition was received, and presented by M Marvin Bernard, one of the Montagnard representatives.

At the College itself precautions were taken to prevent any disturbance on the reappearance of M. Lherminier in his hall. Troops were stationed in one of the parts of the college, and in the neighbourhood, and parcels of cavalry were in the Place du Carnival and the Rue St. Jacques. In the interior of the college a commissary of police and eighty agents were ready to take into custody those who should attempt a disturbance. While the professor delivered his lecture a few students attempted to interrupt him, but they were seized and expelled. The lecture was continued without further disturbance.

The Government have also had to encounter much difficulty with respect to the re-constitution of the Garde Mobile; and a bitter scene, which occurred between their officers and General Changarnier on Saturday, will be found illustrated and described at page 69.

On Sunday, between two and three o'clock, delegates from the Mobiles, forming nearly a battalion, met in the Champs Elysées. They proceeded to the Palace of the President of the Republic to protest against the ministerial decree changing their organisation. Admission, however, was refused to them, and they withdrew. At a later hour a few delegates were admitted to the presence of Changarnier, when a long conversation ensued. The General, however, peremptorily refused to grant any of their demands; and, when they referred to the promises made to them by the Provisional Government, he replied that the Provisional Government, being self-constituted, might do as they pleased, but that he was not bound to perform their engagements. He also told them that they were deceived by evil-minded men, whose intention was to excite insurrection: He told them that there was no intention of disbanding them, as they were led to suppose, but that it was impossible not to make some reforms in the corps of officers. He, however, warned them, that, if they attempted any disturbance, they would only ensure their own destruction; "and," added the General, "you know me: you may fully believe me when I declare solemnly to you that they who impose the stroke will never re-open them" (Ceux qui déclancheront les guerres ne les replaceront pas); meaning, of course, that no mercy would be shown to the insurgents. On this they went away, and proceeded to their quarters in the Carrousel, the courtyard of which was occupied by a battalion of the 24th Light Infantry.

About six o'clock, General Perrot, accompanied by a squadron of Dragoons, proceeded to the barracks, and having his men drawn up in the court, entered alone, and harangued the Mobiles nearly in the same terms as General Changarnier had already done. They remained quietly in their barracks for the rest of the night. Several of the corps, however, announced their intention to march upon the Assembly, declaring that though it was not the Assembly who wanted to disband them, yet they knew that it was the conduct of that body that was the cause of all.

In the course of the day (Sunday), according to an official announcement in the Moniteur of Monday, a Cabinet Council was held at the palace of the President of the Republic. The Ministers having announced the events of Saturday to the President, he replied "that he saw no reason to change his course of policy, and that the Cabinet might depend upon his firm and persevering support."

Whether the threat of the Mobiles was regarded by the authorities in a serious light, or from some other cause, Paris was on Monday morning startled by the beating of the rappel.

From an early hour crowds of ferocious-looking men continued emerging from the darkness and mystery of the faubourgs. The morning was cold and wet, and a heavy rain fell, but the National Guards gradually turned out to the rappel, and in a few moments the whole of the vast quarter of Paris in the neighbourhood of the public offices, the National Assembly, Place de la Concorde, &c. was covered with armed men; while the crowds of people continued to increase, neither the blackness of the morning, nor the rain which for some time fell heavily, producing any effect on them as they moved along the Boulevards.

The precautions taken to prevent any tumult were very effective. A dozen pieces of artillery were planted on the bridge in the front of the National Assembly, and the neighbouring streets and quays were occupied by masses of troops of all arms. Upwards of 80,000 men of the line—cavalry, infantry, and artillery—in addition to the National Guards, were likewise concentrated in the Champs Elysées, the Place de la Bastille, at the Hôtel de Ville, on the Place de la Bastile, along the Boulevards, and wherever else danger was expected; and in short, throughout the day, the whole of Paris had exactly the appearance it presented in the midst of the insurrection of June.

At two o'clock the President of the Republic, in the uniform of a General of the National Guard, and attended by his aide-de-camp and a party of the staff, visited the Boulevards and other places where the troops were stationed. He rode along the Place de la Concorde, the Boulevard de la Madeleine, des Capucins, from de la Paix, Place de la Bourse, Rue de Richelieu, Rue de Rivoli, and in an immense crowd of people—the largest assembled on any occasion since the translation of the remains of Napoleon in December, 1840—he received Lind, and shouts of "Vive le Président!" "Vive la République!" "A bas les Ministres!" "A bas Changarnier!" A few cries were also heard of "Vivent les Clubs!" and three or four of "Vive Pauperie!"

The President sat his horse with much dexterity. He was also enthusiastically saluted by the well-dressed persons in the balconies and windows on both sides of the streets he traversed. He continued his course, and expressed his intention of visiting the Faubourg St. Antoine, the most dangerous, quarter of the capital. His presence in the streets produced a good effect. (See the Engraving upon the preceding page.)

At eight o'clock in the evening, when the Assembly rose, the troops in its immediate vicinity were withdrawn, no disturbance nor any inclination towards one having been manifested by the crowds, who gazed more in curiosity than in anger at the hostile preparations.

In the Faubourgs St. Marceau and St Antoine, however, the precautions were continued throughout the night. Strong guards were placed at the entrance of it; and lines of sentries, in some streets double, in others triple, were posted all over that dangerous quarter. The orders were to fire the moment a single paving-stone was displaced, or a single barricade attempted to be constructed; no matter how few in number the parties were that might present themselves. This signal would have brought to the spot a large force, as as at once and with effect to crush the plotters before they had a barricade to such pretensions made; and in short, the whole of the arrangements were most judicious. The foundation of the barricades being always the most difficult part of that sort of architecture so familiar to the Parisians, it was certainly almost better, and moreover, much less difficult, to prevent their erection than to take or demolish them when formed. After the first two or three feet of barricades are raised, the rest is comparatively easy.

In the other parts of the capital, particularly those places between the internal and external boulevard, from the Porte St. Denis to the Colonne de Juillet on one side, and the Barrière de la Poissonière to the Barrière de Menilmontant on the other, similar preventive measures were adopted; and strong patrols of cavalry and infantry traversed the intermediate spaces. Staff officers visited, at short intervals, all those posts, and the most frequent and exact communications were kept up between the circles and squares.

The night passed over quietly, and on Tuesday morning Paris appeared to have completely recovered from its agitation of the preceding day. The utmost tranquility prevailed [illegible] The Parthenon and the Palace of the Luxembourg continued to be occupied by an imposing force. The military prison of the Abbaye was also strongly guarded, and sentries from the 24th Light Infantry [illegible] the entrance of the Gendarmerie Mobile, the former principle Guard of Paris, which had come in from Versailles in the afternoon of Monday.

Some doubt hangs over the cause of all this excessive and unexpected movement. It created an immense agitation among the peaceable portion of the inhabitants, who were greatly at a loss to account for it. The general impression was that the reports which had been afloat for some days previously of a general rising among the Socialists and Socialists were true, and that the Government had taken these precautions in order to prevent it.

During Monday night the Government had got notice that the secret societies were sitting, and that a grand attack upon the Garde Mobile and the entire force was immediately sent to General Changarnier, who at once gave the necessary orders, and sent [illegible] the villages [illegible] Marshal Bureaud to take the command of the Army [illegible] with instructions to march upon Paris, by the Barrière de Clichy. M. Bugeaud immediately left Paris for that purpose early on Monday morning. But this has not been considered sufficient to account for the extraordinary multitude of the display of military force on the occasion. Various surmises have appeared in the journals on the matter. Among others, is stated the intention of the Government to make a new coup d'état; that the display of all this force was merely for the purpose of provoking a collision, in which case an attempt to change the form of the Government would have been made by proclaiming the Prince Emperor. The rumour was extremely very prevalent throughout the day last, on the first symptom of a movement, the troops would have suppressed it to the cry of "Vive l'Empereur!" but that several circumstances have since occurred to render impossible such a scheme. These circumstances were the affair of the Garde Mobile and the dread of throwing into the opposite ranks so great an addition to their force; the absence of cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" and of any manifestation of a favourable kind on the part of the National Guard

The Moniteur du Soir announces, that after the sitting of the Committee of the National Assembly on Saturday, M. Thiers had an explanation with M. Troplong, in consequence of some expressions used by the latter relative to M. Thiers's conduct when he was President of the Council in the year 1840. An explanation having been given to Colonel Rumigny, M. Marrast, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Assembly, the seconds chosen by M. Thiers, and MM. Grévy and Edouet, the friends of M. Trélat, the matter was amicably arranged.

On Monday morning a duel with small swords took place between M. Clement Thomas, who has become so conspicuous by his peculiar conduct in the Assembly, and M. Coutagon, the editor of the Corsaire, in consequence of an article published in that journal. Both parties were wounded severely.

Some arrests had been made: amongst them were those of Colonel Forrestier, of the 6th battalion of the National Guards, and Count d'Alton Shee, ex-Peer of France.

On Monday General Changarnier met with an accident that had nearly proved very dangerous. Having had his attention directed by his servant to one of his pistols, which had remained charged for five months, and which, if left in that state, might cause some accident, he took it up and fired it. From the length of time that the weapon had been loaded, the recoil was so great that the pistol escaped from the General's hand, and struck him on the forehead

The Government, according to the latest accounts, was vigorously, but with due regard to equity and the peculiar circumstances of the case, enforcing the decree for the re-organisation of the Garde Mobile. The men had the option of receiving their discharge at once, and a month's pay, without any deductions, or of entering the new battalions. Should the number of candidates for service of the Garde Mobile exceed that of the force fixed by the decree, the unsuccessful candidates might either receive their discharge, with the gratuity above mentioned, or volunteer into the line.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

MONDAY.—General Cavaignac and Lamoricière arrived at an early hour, and remained a long time in conference together. General Lebreton took his seat, dressed in his full uniform, having been invested in the morning with the command-in-chief of the forces concentrated round the palace.

The greatest agitation prevailed in the Assembly when M. Marrast, the President, made his appearance. No sooner had the Secretary read the minutes of the preceding sitting, than the tribune was occupied by many members holding in their hands petitions for and against the dissolution of the National Assembly

M. Odillon Barrot, Minister of Justice, having ascended the tribune, made the following statement. The Government, he said, had thought proper to adopt measures to ensure respect for the laws and protect the security of the Assembly and the people. The time of the engagement of the Garde Mobile being on the point of expiring, the Government had prepared regulations and conditions to facilitate the re-engagement of such of the men as wished to continue in the service. February was the term of their engagement, and the Government did not wish to leave matters to the last day. The measures devised were such as would satisfy the gratitude of the country for the services rendered by those brave soldiers, the necessities of the treasury, and the regularity of the military service. The soldiers thereby secured were to receive a certain sum, which would enable them to wait until they could find employment. The proposed re-organisation had excited considerable emotion, particularly among the officers, who were desirous to preserve a rank to which they were no more entitled than the other officers of the National Guard. That emotion was communicated to a few battalions, and the Government saw the necessity of adopting means to prevent that discontent from degenerating into rebellion—the eterna. enemies of public repose, order, and society. "You and your colleagues!" exclaimed M. Hourtat.—Cries of "Order, order!"

The President told M. Hourtat, that if he interrupted M. Odillon Barrot a second time, he would be obliged to call him to order.

M. Odillon Barrot, continuing, said, that the enemies of society were anxious to turn to account the discontent of those brave young men, and, during the night, the Government had received a report, the certainty of which would not be questioned, stating that those deluded soldiers had entered into communication with a focus of political passions. This circumstance was a danger, of which the gravity had been perhaps exaggerated, but, as it might lead to deplorable consequences, the Cabinet could not, without sacrificing its responsibility, avoid paying it particular attention. It preferred preventing disturbances to having to punish their authors; and the chief of the military forces had, accordingly, adopted the necessary precautionary measures for defeating those culpable manœuvres. The President of the Assembly having, by virtue of a decree of the Assembly, claimed the disposal of the troops, his request was immediately complied with, and he appointed General Lebreton, one of the questors, to take the chief command of the armed force. The liberty and independence of the Assembly were completely guaranteed. The legislative and executive powers might differ in opinion on certain points, but there were two on which they were perfectly agreed: the dignity of the institution, to which they had sworn allegiance, and the repression of anarchical and anti-social attempts.

After a few observations from some representatives on the subject, the Assembly approved the decree of the proclamation of M. Rateau in favour of the dissolution of the Assembly. The discussion was stormy and protracted, and at its close—

Several Voices: A division!

A Voice: The ballot!

The President: The ballot will be proceeded to.

At this moment a compact group of members assembled round the tribune. Cries for the appel nominal were heard from every side. The President used his bell with violence, but without effect, and the ushers became hoarse with calling for silence. It was only after a delay of more than an hour that the appel nominal could be commenced. One of the secretaries began to call over the names, but his voice was completely drowned in the tumult which prevailed. The result of the ballot was as follows:—

Number of voters	821
Absolute majority	411
For the conclusions of the Committee	405
Against them	416
Majority	11

The President: The bill is therefore read a first time, and the second reading will take place in due course. (Immense agitation.)

The Left and Centre received the announcement of approbation on the Right. A voice on the Left cried, "A bas les Royalistes."

The sitting was brought to a close at half-past eight, in a state of extraordinary excitement

AUSTRIA.

The advices from Vienna are to the 25th ult. There was nothing stirring in the political world. The report that the Diet would be prorogued till the 15th of May was gaining ground; and the young Emperor having ordered the sum of 800,000 florins to be distributed amongst the poor of Vienna, was regarded as an indication of the Government's intention to remain for some time in the capital.

Vienna was visited by a fearful storm, accompanied with thunder and lightning and rain, on the day and night of the 24th. Considerable damage was done to property.

From Berlin we learn that the elections had gone very much in favour of the Liberals.

SICILY.—Letters from Palermo mention great rejoicings there on the occasion of the anniversary of Sicilian Independence. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm manifested. In most solemn oaths were taken against the Bourbons, to whom eternal hatred was sworn.

UNITED STATES

American papers of the 12th ult. have been received. [illegible] In the Senate, on the 8th, Mr. Calhoun introduced a bill [illegible] motion for bringing in a bill prohibiting the slave trade in Columbia had given rise in the house of Representatives to counter motions, amendments, and their consequent discussions. The Illinois Legislature have passed resolutions instructing their senators and representatives to obtain the prohibition of slavery in the newly-acquired territory. Mr. Calhoun has issued a manifesto urging the southern states to unite and prepare for a concerted defiance of their "rights" against the aggressions of the north

In the senate, the Judicial Committee have made their report adverse to Mr. Douglas's bill for the admission of California as a state of the Union. The intention was to declare the whole of the territory acquired from Mexico united into the Union as one state. The Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives have reported in favour of Free Trade between the United States and Canada, and also with Cuba

The cholera had very greatly subsided at New Orleans, so much so that its disappearance in a very short time was confidently expected. Its manner there was intensely cold, which circumstance might probably have produced this beneficial effect. The thermometer had fallen to zero. At Vicksburgh, also, which had suffered greatly, no new cases had occurred for the week ending on the 20th, and the epidemic was believed to be almost extinct

The California mania is raging more generally than ever. Many holders of lucrative situations have given them up to become gold seekers. Several artists, editors, printers, and doctors have also joined in the pilgrimage. On Wednesday, the 24th ult., a meeting was held in New York, to organise an overland expedition to California. Articles of agreement, pledging the subscribers to abide by the orders and instructions of the president and directors, and to provide, for the purposes of the association, a waggon fitted by a large number of persons, each paying the initiation fee of 1 dollar. The printed report of a committee appointed at a previous meeting was also produced and distributed. Many of the members of the association are clergymen. The New York Courier and Enquirer complains of frozen types, and that their "standing news" defies distribution, but was as hard and compact as adamant.

INDIA

Advices in anticipation of the overland mail, from Bombay to January 3, and Calcutta, December 28, have been received during the week.

The only movements which had occurred at Moultan since our last accounts were two reconnoitres by the Commander-in-Chief, one on the 1st December, and the second on the 12th of December, when no serious molestation was offered. Narrain Singh, who had marched out in the direction of Jhung—a large trading town, about [illegible] river—on the 1st December, had been compelled to return by Sheikh Emamun-ood-deen, who had been sent out to watch him.

From the army of the Chenab we learn that the Commander-in-Chief, with all the forces that were on this side of the river, crossed the Chenab on the 10th of December, without any loss, excepting a few camels. They are now encamped on the right bank. So soon as it was discovered that the Sikhs, after their retirement on the night of the 3d, had taken up a strong position on the Jhelum, two marches ahead of us, it was resolved to leave them alone till after the fall of Moultan. For the last fortnight, accordingly, the troops had rested on their arms; nor were they likely to have taken the field till New Year's-day. This was said to be in consequence of orders from the Governor-General. Jubbar Khan, of Cabool, familiarly known as "the good Nawaub," had arrived at Peshawur with an army of Afghans, and was in communication with Chuttur Singh. Its purposes were not known: he was thought more likely to act a friendly part towards us than a hostile one. Chuttur Singh had not yet joined the main force. Major Lawrence was in the camp of Shere Singh: and Captain Abbott continued to maintain himself in the Hazarah country. Lieutenant Robinson, the assistant of the latter, had made his way to General Thackwell's camp. There had been no military movement of any note during the fortnight. The delay was the subject of universal complaint.

It has been intimated that three regiments will immediately be sent out from England, and an augmentation of the Bengal army is talked of. The total of the present amounts to above 200,000 men, being stronger by 50,000 men and 834 officers than it was on its last peace establishment ten years since, when the Punjaub, Scinde, and Gwalior were all unsubdued, and the Affghan war was in prospect.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

REFORM IN THE DOCKYARDS.

On Saturday last an Admiralty circular was issued to the various Dockyards, transmitting 16 minutes, which consist of a plan for reducing the expenditure and increasing the efficiency of the Dockyard establishments.

Nos. 1 to 5 of the minutes relate to—

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE YARDS.—Their Lordships, desiring to secure a prompter co-operation between the different departments of the dockyards, and to afford to the officers in charge of them more frequent means of communicating immediately with the superintendents, direct that a morning muster of all the principal officers be held in the mould loft at 9½ A.M. precisely, in each dockyard, when the orders for the day are to be read in the presence of the superintendent, or of the officer next to him in rank.

The next minute contains some stringent regulations respecting the demand for consumption (of stores:" The progressive increase of the vote for stores, which has been from £626,558 in 1835, to £1,054,129 in 1846-7, and has averaged £1,024,039 during the last three years, has called for the most serious considera-

The result is to be communicated at the usual time, and in the ordinary form, to the storekeeper-general, who now receives, on the 14th and 21st of the first month of each quarter, a return of the quantities of each article in store, and of the probable wants of each dockyard (forms No. 162 and 163); but the superintendent is to communicate directly with the Board of Admiralty, and to state that the demands for the quarter have been duly considered at the estimate board, and do not, in his opinion, exceed the legitimate requirements of the yard."

In the Superintendent's Quarterly Return, the storekeeper of the yard shall insert the money value of the stores demanded, as well as the quantities, so that it may at once appear whether the demand for the quarter exceeds in fair proportion of the parliamentary vote. Besides this, a monthly return of demands is to be made by the superintendents; but their Lordships now direct that in each dockyard an experienced clerk shall be transferred from the storekeeper's department to the office of the superintendent, where he will assist in checking the demands of each week as soon as sent in, and preparing them for a weekly audit by the superintendent, who shall pass no account without satisfying himself that the

The receiver of stores is to call the attention of the Board of Admiralty to those ships from which the largest proportion of stores is found to be best state, as well as those in which neglect and wastefulness are apparent. LORD BATEMAN.

The noble Lord, whose Portrait we present this week, was the seconder of the Address in answer to her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne, on Thursday evening, in the House of Peers; and, notwithstanding his great youth and consequent want of experience in addressing so critical and discriminating an audience—it being the first time he had ever made a set speech in their Lordships' House—the noble Lord acquitted himself most respectably on the occasion. His Lordship, indeed, passed with éclat this test which young aspirants to political fame find so trying in the outset of their Parliamentary career; and from it much success may be augured for his future reputation in debate.

William Bateman Bateman Hanbury, Baron of Shuldon Court, county of Hereford, is the second of the title, and is only in his twenty-third year, having been born in July, 1826. His Lordship's family is not one of ancient nobility, but belongs rather to that numerous section of the aristocracy which, deriving its origin from the more wealthy of the mercantile classes, has, by the display of commanding talents in the political world, acquired sufficient influence to have its members raised to the Peerage by the favour of the Sovereign.

The noble Lord's father was the first baron of the title, having received his patent of nobility in 1837. The family is descended from the Hanburys of Kelmarsh, in Northamptonshire, a younger branch of the Hanburys of Worcestershire.

One of the noble Lord's immediate ancestors was Sir James Bateman, Knight, Lord Mayor of London in 1717, Sub-Governor of the South Sea Company the year following, and for many years a member of the Lower House of Parliament.

The present noble Lord was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge.

GENERAL CHANGARNIER AND THE OFFICERS OF THE GARDE MOBILE.

In aggravation of the difficulties which the French Government have encountered from the hostile attitude of the National Assembly, the recent measure adopted, with respect to the re-constitution of the Garde Mobile, began to exhibit its results on Saturday. The reduction of the Garde Mobile from 25 battalions to 12, and other regulations with respect to their pay and discipline, were matters which these young heroes of the barricades considered should not be endured without a protest on their part, towards which course they were instigated by the Red Republicans. Much uncalled for bitterness was introduced into the matter (awkward enough without it) by the indiscretion of General Changarnier, who, with the view of repressing the discontent of the Mobiles, summoned to the Tuileries on Saturday morning the principal officers of the twenty-five battalions. The scene which ensued is thus described by the National, who gives it as from an eye-witness:—"The language used by the General to them was anything but conciliatory. According to him, the Garde Mobile had excited the jealousy of the army; and as this latter was the more numerous body, it was deemed necessary to sacrifice the other to it: then, in terminating, he said, 'I understand that the Garde Mobile is discontented; that it is to assemble to-morrow in the large opening in the Champs Elysées, the Carré Marigny. But let it beware what it does! If it stirs I will have it cut to pieces (je la ferai pulper.) The officers kept silence, and did not depart from that reserve which discipline imposed on them. The General then thought it necessary to go still farther, and addressing four chefs de bataillon, he ordered them to proceed for a month to the military prison of the Abbaye; one because he had passed before the General without saluting him; two others, because he was not satisfied with their previous conduct; and the fourth for motives just as futile. This order called forth, as had been expected some representations. At the first word, the General rang the bell, and at that signal a door opened; a detachment of gendarmerie poured into the room, surrounded the officers just before designated, and made them prisoners. Most of these officers had belonged to the army, and discipline constrained them to keep silence. But one of them had entered the Garde Mobile as a volunteer, and, as such, was not so rigorously bound to lay a restraint on his acts. That officer was M. Aladenize, the same who had been compromised under the fallen régime by his devotedness to M. Louis Bonaparte. M. Aladenize, yielding to the indignation which such a trap was calculated to inspire in an honourable mind, declared at once that he resigned his commission, and breaking his sword, he threw it at the General's feet. Then, speaking as a simple citizen, he expressed, in the most energetic language, the sentiments which that officer's strange conduct had given birth to. The General, somewhat astonished, then went back on his first decision, and contented himself with ordering M. Aladenize alone to be carried off to the Abbaye. Such was this deplorable scene, of which we have given only the most striking particulars. We shall only add this one reflection—the public will know what to think of a commanding officer who acts in such a manner towards officers who have rendered good service to the country.

"P.S.—On the order of General Changarnier, the chefs de bataillon Dussigneur, Arrighi, Bazaac, and Caumont, as well as the commanding officer of the 10th battalion, have been sent to join their comrade Aladenize."

The Anatomy Act.—A small Saving.—"I am aware that dissection cannot be practised in London as it ought to be," said Mr. Guthrie, in his fifth lecture on surgery, as reported in the Lancet. "A student cannot teach himself anatomy; a defect in our institutions which depends on causes somewhat ludicrous. Mr. Warburton carried a bill through the Legislature, which had for its objects the prevention of exhumation, and the facilitating the study of anatomy. In the first he succeeded perfectly, in the second he failed, principally because the Act of Parliament was deficient in a very simple clause, directing the manner in which the equalisation of the means of study should be effected. To supply this defect, recourse was had to an inspectorial order from the Home-Office, contravening the most important part of the act, which was thus virtually barked in its infancy, and so effectually that the supply, I am informed from an authority I do not doubt, which was as two in the first year the act came into operation, is now as one, to the same school, and to the same if not to a larger number of students. This has been done at an expense to the public of what some say is eight hundred, some say a thousand, some say twelve hundred pounds a year—a sum, whatever it may be, which has been thoroughly effective in destroying the study of anatomy in London. The gentlemen at the Home-Office, who preside over this branch of science, will not perceive their error, neither will they alter their modes of proceeding. What can be done? The only hope that I can see or think of is in Richard Cobden. This gentleman is desirous of having at his disposal ten millions of the money now expended on the army, the navy, and the ordnance, which he is not likely to get; now, if he could but be prevailed upon to take in aid the one thousand pounds, wasted in preventing anatomy from being either taught or learned in London, he would do the profession and the public good service. It is but a small sum, I allow, with respect to ten millions; but Mr. Cobden is a financier, and knows that one thousand pounds constitute an item of four figures, to say nothing of the service he will render the public; for, from the moment he gets the money for other purposes, and the Home-Office is declared non compos in anatomy, the act and science will, with a very little governance, begin to flourish."

Sir B. Hall, M.P.—The hon. member for Marylebone, in a letter read at the vestry meeting of that parish on Saturday, states:—"I have been suffering most severely since July last from an attack of neuralgia, brought on by over mental exertion during last session, and also from an affection of the eye; and I shall, therefore, be unable to attend the House of Commons when Parliament meets. I am now, however, gradually recovering my sight, and I hope to be able, in a few weeks, to resume my duties."

California (from Gordon's "Geographical Grammar, 1722").—This island was formerly esteemed a peninsula, but now found to be entirely surrounded by water. Its north part was discovered by Sir Francis Drake, anno 1577, and by him called New Albion; where, erecting a pillar, he fastened thereto the Arms of England. The inland parts thereof were afterwards searched into, and being found to be only a dry barren, cold country, Europeans were discouraged from sending colonies to the same; so that it still remains in the hands of the natives.—From a Correspondent.

A Female General.—The lovely family of the Emperor Nicholas was brought up from the cradle by English nurses and governesses, under the superintendence of an old Scotchwoman, who was under-nurse to the present Emperor in his infancy. This individual holds the rank of a general officer (for everything in Russia is measured by a military scale), and has been decorated with the Order of St. Andrew, ennobled, and enriched. Some five-and-twenty years ago she came a servant girl to Russia in a Scotch trader's family, who turned her adrift in St. Petersburgh. A lucky chance procured her the situation of under nursery-maid in the Emperor Paul's family, where she was placed about the person of the present Emperor to teach him to speak English. His attachment to her was so great, that when he married, he raised her to the head of his nursery establishment, where she has honourably gone through all the military gradations of rank to her present one of general. I suppose she will die a field-marshal.—Miss Homer's Bird of Passage.

THE LATE LIEUT.-COLONEL WILLIAM HAVELOCK K.H., 14th LIGHT DRAGOONS.

Last week we presented our readers with a portrait of Brigadier-General Cureton, one of the officers who fell in the late action on the Chenab; we have this week, succeeded in obtaining a portrait of another officer, Colonel W (il Havelock, K.H., who also fell in the recent skirmish with the Sikhs. The miniature from which this print is taken was painted some years ago; it represents the lamented soldier in early life, and is allowed to be a striking likeness.

THE LATE LIEUT.-COL. HAVELOCK.

Colonel Havelock was born in 1795, and was the son of H. Havelock, Esq. formerly of Ingress Park, near Dartford. He was educated at the Charter-house School; and then studied under a private tutor, previously to entering the army. At the early age of 15 he carried the colours of his regiment, the 43rd Light Infantry, in the action at Coa. His steps were as follows:—Ensign, July 12, 1810; Lieutenant, May 12, 1812; Captain, February 19, 1813; Major, December 21, 1830; Lieutenant-Colonel, April 30, 1841.

His services in Europe were as follows: he was engaged in the Peninsula from July, 1810, till the end of that war, in 1814; including the battles of Busaco, Sabugal, Salamanca, and Victoria, the passage of the Bidassoa, the battle of the Nivelle, the affair near Bayonne, and the battles of Orthes and Toulouse. He served also in the campaign of 1815, and was slightly wounded at Waterloo, where he was aide-de-camp to Baron Alten, and received the Cross of the Hanoverian order. He subsequently served at Corfu; and afterwards, on exchanging into the 4th Light Dragoons, proceeded with his regiment, first to Bombay, where he was aide-de-camp to Sir Charles Cuthlie; and then to Madras, where he was on the staff of Lord Elphinstone. His last exchange was into the 14th Light Dragoons. He was engaged in the various movements of Sir Charles Napier's force in the Bombay Contingent, and then in the Punjaub, until, at the Ford of Ramnuggur, he fell, mortally wounded, at the head of his regiment, in battle against the forces o Shere Singh.

Colonel Havelock, many years since, married Miss Chaplin, a relative of the late Chief Justice Tindal; and by her he has left a large family. He was a Knight of the Hanoverian Order, and had been presented with several medals, to which no officer was better entitled, for his thorough knowledge of his profession, as well as for his personal courage.

For the loan of the miniature whence the accompanying Portrait has been engraved, our acknowledgments are due to the courtesy of Dr. Baddely, of Chelmsford, a schoolfellow and friend of the lamented soldier.

M. ALADENIZE, OF THE GARDE MOBILE, RESIGNING HIS COMMISSION TO GENERAL CHANGARNIER.

ATTEMPT TO STEAL THE CROZIER OF WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM, AT OXFORD.

Early on the morning of Thursday week, the chapel of New College, at Oxford, was entered by means of a skeleton key, and a pair of massive gilt candlesticks stolen from off the altar. The thieves had, however, by means of a knife, which they left behind them, attempted to dislodge from its niche in the wall of the chancel of the chapel the valuable and antique Crozier of William of Wykeham, which is shown to visitors as a relic of the founder of New College. On searching St. Peter's churchyard, adjoining the College Gardens, there were found a rope ladder, 20 feet long, five centre-bits, a small portable crow-bar, and a pair of shoes, with wool on the soles, to prevent the wearer's steps being heard. With the assistance of these implements there is no doubt the thieves would have succeeded in breaking open the aperture in the chapel wall, where the valuable Crozier is kept; but, from the tools being found in the churchyard, it is supposed that the robbers had gained an entrance into the chapel, and then forgot that they had left their house-breaking implements behind them; that, finding it was impossible to dislodge the Crozier with a knife, they went back to procure them, but probably, being disturbed, decamped, taking with them the candlesticks. That such was most likely the fact, is borne out by the knife being left in the chapel, and the skeleton key in the door.

CROZIER OF WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM.

The Crozier is a valuable mediæval relic, and was given, in his last will and testament, to his college in Oxford, by the celebrated prelate and architect, William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, the founder of the New College, Oxford, as well as of the college at Winchester.

The will in which the bequest is made is dated the 24th day of July, 1403. It is printed in Bishop Lowth's "Life of Wykeham," and contains much valuable archæological information relative to enamelling, drawing, embroidering, &c.

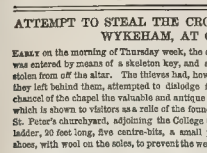
The Crozier, which is of silver, gilt, stands about seven feet in height, and would consequently, from its weight in solid metal, have been no inconsiderable booty to the daring burglars. The staff is divided into compartments, beautifully enamelled in blue and green of the most brilliant tints, on which the golden stems and foliage are gracefully thrown. The head consists of several tiers of elegant Gothic tracery, in which are niches of the most chaste design, containing figures of saints and martyrs; the rich tabernacle-work of the middle compartment of the head being supported by angels with outstretched wings alternating with golden foliage. The crook, or circle, is divided into compartments, in each of which an angel is represented playing on some musical instrument. Amongst the instruments exhibited may be named the trumpets, the bagpipes, the organ, the sackbut, the pipe, and the dulcimer. The ground of these compartments is a bright blue, and the vestments of the angels in red, green, and other gorgeous colours. The whole crook is elaborately crocketed; and in it, instead of the Holy Lamb frequently introduced upon other crosiers, is a kneeling figure of the Bishop himself, his hands uplifted in prayer.

The Crozier is in excellent preservation, and has lost little of its original beauty. The colouring of the enamel presents all its details as minutely as in the days of pristine glory, and the precious stones with which it is profusely embellished retain all their former magnificence.

The custom of bearing a Crozier as a symbol of pastoral authority is very ancient, and it has always been considered a mark of the highest dignity.

CALAMITOUS INUNDATION IN THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND.

The weather in the north of Scotland, and particularly in Invernesshire, was tempestuous to an almost unprecedented degree during all last week. One storm of wind and rain followed another for several days and nights, almost without intermission, and with unequalled severity and heaviness. These storms were frequently accompanied by vivid lightning. Many of the roads and wide extents of low-lying lands were flooded, and travelling became exceedingly difficult and dangerous. The greatest calamity arising from these storms is the complete destruction, on Thursday morning (last week), of the fine old bridge over the Ness, at Inverness, which, after bravely standing the floods and tempests of more than 160 years, has been by the recent inundation carried away. There is much historical and antiquarian interest attached to this bridge. It was built at the foot of the romantic hill on which, according to Shakspeare, Macbeth's castle stood. The building of the bridge began in 1685, and was finished in the year of the revolution (1688). It spanned the swift waters of the Ness by seven well-constructed arches. The late eminent engineer, Mr. Telford, esteemed it the handsomest old bridge in Great Britain: although it had a slight rise in the centre, yet the arches partook more of the modern elliptical form than was at all common in days of old. It is stated in the statistical account of Inverness, that the ancient gaol of that burgh consisted only of a single damp dingy vault of one of the arches of this bridge. This strange place of imprisonment was always pointed out as a curiosity to strangers. The bridge (older than any on the Thames) might have continued to defy the river currents for another century, because the Ness, although a copious and rapid stream, seldom overflows its banks like its neighbours, the Findhorn and Spey. This equability of current is caused by its waters being husbanded in Loch Ness, and given out gradually by a narrow outlet. From the great depth of the lake, and the short rapid course of the river, there was never any loss to injure the fabric; but a cause was at work for its demolition which could never have entered into the calculation of its architect.



THE OLD BRIDGE AT INVERNESS, DESTROYED IN THE LATE FLOODS

It is well known that the Caledonian Canal is carried through the great glen of Scotland, by joining the three great lakes of Ness, Oich, and Lochie, by short cuttings between them. The summit lock of the canal, on Loch Oich, about 35 miles from Inverness, is 96 feet above high water at Inverness. Some of the banks and locks of the Oich, near Fort Augustus, are said to have given way, and to have allowed the waters of the upper level to flow into Loch Ness, which, although possessing a capacious basin of about 25 miles in length, and of about an average breadth of one mile, became swollen to such a size as to produce a fresh or speat in the river of unprecedented violence, and destroy the bridge.

All the lower part of Inverness was laid under water, the houses forsaken, and the inhabitants glad to make their escape in boats, and such other craft as could be got at. Happily no lives were lost, but there has been great destruction of property. The wooden bridge, now the only means of land communication between the two districts of the town, and between the eastern and northern counties of Scotland, is left tottering, and in momentary danger of being swept away. Other accounts ascribe the calamity solely to the rise of water in Loch Ness from heavy rains and melted snow, and make no mention of the inundation from Loch Oich.

NEWARK CORN EXCHANGE.

NEWARK CORN EXCHANGE.

This handsome edifice has just been opened for public business, in the town of Newark, Notts. It is situate in Castlegate. The length of the interior is 83 feet 9 inches, by 53 feet wide; the floor is several feet above the level of the street, thus affording space below for a suite of rooms, which are in reality on the ground-floor (and not cellar stories), as the land dips westward towards the river. Upon entering the Exchange, the visitor is struck with the admirable manner in which the greatest possible quantity of light is conveyed from the roof; it has been built in a similar manner to the roofs of picture galleries. It is found that a room is best lighted by an oblique roof, reflecting the light from the N.E.; and accordingly we see three lights of unpolished plate glass extending the full length of the hall, and placed so as to reflect full light from those quarters equally throughout the room; the roof is arranged in such a manner, that a continuous line of light can be obtained to light the whole of the surface to the same extent, and this is a great object accomplished, when the room is required for the purpose of buying grain. At present the building is not quite complete; but a system of ventilation will be adapted, which will produce 100 cubic feet of change of air every second, with facilities for supplying the room with warm fresh air in winter, and cool air in the summer, which, if required, can be moistened by refrigerators; thus, a constant stream of fresh air can be introduced, and the vitiated air discharged.

The style of the building is Italian. The principle of the composition appears to be, to make the exterior of the building expressive of the interior use and purpose, so that even from the appearance of the front it may be inferred that the building consists of a single large room. The composition is of great simplicity in its arrangement, having three arched recessed doorways of entrance on a large scale, which give light and shade, and practical effect; these are enriched with appropriate designs, each division having lunettes decorated with shells, with corn springing from the centre. The centre of the front is surmounted by a clock-tower, which will have a transparent dial. The turret is flanked by two figures, the work of Mr. John Bell, the eminent sculptor (who furnished the statue of Lord Falkland for the new Houses of Parliament). The figures are of Ancin stone, and each seven feet in height. They represent Agriculture and Commerce, symbolical of the use of the building; the introduction of these figures shewing the practicability of employing art of high class in the decoration of a building, at a cost not exceeding that of mere routine and mostly unmeaning ornament.

An additional shaft is erected at the back of the building, and is carried to such a height as to admit of its being used as part of the ventilating apparatus, to draw off the vitiated air from the building. It is proposed to place in the interior of the building a clock, or time measurer, a rain gauge, a wind gauge, and a barometer; so that all the elementary sources which influence the growth and ripening of crops may be ascertained, and all the considerations which affect agricultural pursuits shall be recorded. In the spandrils of the archways between the doors are shields, charged with sheaves of corn. The capitals of the pillars have been expressly designed so as to be illustrative of the purposes of the building, and the capitals of the pillars in the interior correspond with those of the exterior, consisting of ears of corn, &c.

Thus, the use and purposes of the building have been studied in the interior as well as exterior decoration of the edifice.

The Newark Corn Exchange has been erected from the designs, and under the superintendence of Mr. Dusabury, of London, the architect of the Derby County Lunatic Asylum, and is highly creditable to his taste and skill. The front is executed in stone from Coxbeach; the entire cost of the building is £4300.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1848.

The French have been again on the very brink and crater of a revolution. They seem, however, to have been saved from the catastrophe, at least for the present, by the overwhelming military strength of the Government whose measures provoked it. Although the old vices of the French people may have helped to bring both themselves and the President of their choice into this new dilemma, the new Ministry is principally to blame. Three several occasions of trouble and uneasiness have arisen within the last few days, all springing from the recklessness and impatience of the Government. Seeing danger in the continued existence of the Clubs of Paris, it proposed a law for their dissolution;—a law plainly at variance with an article in the recently promulgated Constitution, allowing freedom of meeting and discussion. Immediately became evident to all the Republican party—the friends of the Red or Tricolour hue, that Louis Napoleon and his advisers were only prepared to recognise the authority of that document as long as it suited their own purposes to do so. This aroused resistance, and was one occasion of the fearful agitation of the past week. But this was not the only error of the Government. It forgot the services of the Garde Mobile, a species of gallant militia which, under General Cavaignac, was mainly instrumental in saving society from Red Republicanism and anarchy in June last. The Garde Mobile, it appears, was too highly paid, and its continued existence in its original and favoured state gave umbrage to the troops of the line. The Ministry accordingly resolved to disband it; and no attempt was made to conciliate a corps that had done such good service, and that had been held up for public admiration as the saviours of the country. The Garde Mobile, which had shown so well how to aid authority, was prepared, like all other Frenchmen, to resist authority the moment it became really or apparently adverse to itself. Hence a conspiracy and mutiny, full of danger to society, broke out in the capital; and Red Republicanism and Socialism, ever ready to profit by the horrors of civil warfare again raised their heads in the terrible Faubourg St. Antoine, and in the dense purlieus of the twelfth arrondissement. This was the second danger of the week. The third was greater than either, and equally attributable to the want of judgment displayed by the advisers of the President. A majority of the French people, having no particular love for Louis Napoleon, have suddenly taken it into their heads to demand the dissolution of the National Assembly and the election of another Legislative Chamber holding views somewhat more Monarchical than the present body, which is moderately and sincerely Republican. The French people have apparently forgotten that the Assembly is their own deliberate choice—the creature of universal suffrage; and that it was elected by themselves for a certain task, which has not yet been accomplished. Nothing will satisfy them but its immediate and even forcible dissolution, although, by the month of May at the latest, the mission of the Assembly might be peaceably fulfilled, and its dissolution take place without question or disturbance. The new Ministry, finding the Assembly to be hostile to itself, has declared that no adverse vote of that body shall force it to resign. It has, moreover, placed itself openly in the ranks of those who insist upon its dissolution; and joined—though a legal power itself—in the public outcry for the illegal destruction of a constituent, and therefore a Sovereign Assembly, de jure et de facto. It has thus placed itself in an unconstitutional position; arrayed against it all shades of Republican opinion; put the climax to all its previous errors; and, by the combined influence and effect of its three exasperations, produced the imminency of a new Revolution.

We can understand this policy of M. Odillon Barrot and Prince Louis Napoleon, if their object be to overthrow the Republic by a coup d'état; and if they are sure of the army, and of Generals Changarnier and Bugeaud. The one holds the capital in his iron grip, at the head of a more numerous army than was ever before congregated within its walls. The other has left Paris to assume the command of the Army of the Alps, and to lead it, if necessary, against the Republicans. It is possible that the restoration of the Empire is their game; and if it be, it is very likely, considering the predilections of the Bonapartist millions in the provinces, and the notorious Napoleonism of the army, to be successful.

But, if they are sincerely anxious to uphold and to consolidate that Republic which they have sworn to serve, their policy appears more like the result of madness than of reason. General Changarnier is known to be of opinion that the restoration of the Empire is to be easily accomplished. Count Molé, too, thought, when the President was elected, that a month might transform him into Napoleon II.; and M. Odillon Barrot may, possibly, have been converted to the same views. If so, and if he have his coup d'état arranged, we can well understand all the proceedings of the past week, if we cannot well account for them under any other supposition. To provoke an insurrection, and to crush it, is obvious policy on the part of those who have both the strong will and the overwhelming power to make a revolution for their own advantage, on the pretext of combating a revolution attempted by their opponents. It is evident that France is again in the throes. We shall, doubtless, be soon enabled to see the complexion and character of the new birth.

THE Overland Mail brings intelligence from the seat of war in the Punjaub to the 21st of December, from Calcutta to the 24th, and from Bombay to the 4th of January. It furnishes the details of the engagement reported in our last between the forces under General Sir Joseph Thackwell and Shere Singh. They fully confirm the hurried statement sent by the previous mail; and also the supposition we ventured to make, that Shere Singh, though he might have lost a battle, was far from having been defeated. In fact, he made a masterly and successful retreat, with bag and baggage, and has taken up a strong post on the banks of the Jhelum, fourteen miles in advance of Sir Joseph Thackwell's camp, and twenty-four miles from his original position on the Chenab, where the gallant General Cureton lost his life. Here he has fortified himself, having an entrenched camp on both sides of the river. His forces amount to 30,000 men, and he has upwards of one hundred pieces of cannon. No attack had been made on him on the 24th, nor did any seem to be immediately contemplated. Preparations, however, are being made for a decisive blow against Mooltan. Moolraj has but 9000 men in the fortress, and the besieging army under General Whish now amounts, including the allies under Major Edwardes and Colonel Cortlandt, to 28,000 men, well provided. It was the prevalent opinion that Mooltan would be attacked about Christmas, and that nothing would be attempted against Shere Singh in his new entrenchments until the reduction of that fortress.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

COURT AT WINDSOR.

On Tuesday the Royal dinner party at the Castle included the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Amelia of Schleswig-Holstein, Lady Fanny Howard, and Baroness de Speth. Her Majesty's private band attended after dinner in the Castle.

RETURN OF THE COURT TO TOWN

On Wednesday morning the Queen and Prince Albert left Windsor Castle at three minutes before eleven o'clock, attended by Lady Portman, Lord Elphinstone, Major-General Bowles, Captain the Hon. Keppel Craven, Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. Charles B. Phipps, and Captain the Hon. Alexander Gordon, and proceeded to the Slough station of the Great Western Railway, travelling to Paddington by a special train, and subsequently to Buckingham Palace, where the august party arrived at twelve minutes before twelve o'clock. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were received at the Palace by the Viscount Jocelyn, Earl Fortescue, the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Edward Howard, and Colonel Wylde. The Royal Standard was immediately displayed from the top of the new front of the Palace. The Queen went shortly before one o'clock to Gloucester House, to visit her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester. Her Majesty was attended by the Viscountess Jocelyn, Lady in Waiting, and Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, Equerry in Waiting. In the evening her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance of the French Plays with their presence. The Royal suite consisted of the Viscountess Jocelyn, Lord Elphinstone, Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, and Captain the Hon. A. Gordon.

MINISTERIAL DINNERS.—Lord John Russell, First Lord of the Treasury, gave a Parliamentary dinner on Wednesday evening to a numerous party of the Members of the House of Commons. The guests assembled at seven o'clock, at his residence in Downing-street, appearing in uniform and Court costumes. The noble Premier read to his company portions of her Majesty's Speech to be delivered in Parliament on Thursday. The invitations comprised the Right Hon. Charles Wood, the Mover of the Address, Lord Harry Vane, the Seconder of the Address, Mr. E. H. Bunbury. Cabinet Ministers: Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Sir Charles Wood, Sir Francis Baring, Sir John Hobhouse, and the Right Hon. R. Lalouchere. Officers of the Queen's Household: Lord Marcus Hill, Lord Edward Howard, &c., &c.—The Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President of the Council, gave a full-dress dinner also on Wednesday evening, at Lansdowne-house, to the mover and seconder of the Address in the House of Lords, several of the Cabinet Ministers and officers of the state of the Queen's household, and a party of peers Lord Stanley, as leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords, gave a grand political entertainment on Wednesday evening, at his residence in St. James's-square, to an influential circle of Protectionist peers. The following noblemen constituted the party:—The Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Beaufort, the Duke of Montrose, the Duke of Newcastle, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Marquis of Exeter, the Earl of Winchelsea.

Lady John Russell gave a full-dress soirée to a party of one hundred and fifty of the principal nobility and gentry in town, on Wednesday evening, at her residence in Chesham-place.

THE ORLEANS FAMILY.—The whole of the ex-Royal Family of France, who have, as it is known, been staying for several months at the Star and Garter Hotel at Richmond, have, with the whole of their attendants and numerous suite, left Richmond and returned to Claremont, with the intention of permanently taking up their abode at that Royal residence. The Countess of Nemours has considerably improved in health since her sojourn at Richmond, and the Count and the rest of the family are in good health. The defensive state of the receptacles for the supply of water to the establishment at Claremont is understood to be completely removed, and the necessary precautions adopted to prevent the occurrence of similar inconvenience. The ex-Royal family have been in the receipt of important consignments of their personal and private property from the Continent; and in addition to some recent arrivals of the effects of the Duke of Nemours, with a collection of curiosities in his possession when he last resided a portion in Algeria, there have arrived a considerable quantity of plate and other valuable effects, of the Prince de Joinville and other members of the family.

Frederick Peel, Esq., of Trinity College, Cambridge, B.A., the second son of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., was called to the degree of Barrister-at-Law by the Hon. Society of the Inner Temple, on Tuesday last.

THE PAPER DUTY.—The paper-makers are resuming their efforts to get rid of the excise duties. At a meeting held in Edinburgh, last week, they stated the various grounds on which they claim relief from an impost which they allege presses with peculiar hardship on their manufacture. In the glass trade the visitations of the excise, and the numerous and perplexing restrictions to attended the levying of the duty, were felt to be so oppressive, besides retarding the advance of the manufacture, that the Government of Sir Robert Peel at length consented to sweep away the impost entirely. The paper makers have all along contended that they have as relevant ground for relief, whether looking to the annoyances they were exposed to in the course of the process, or to the public policy in removing the obstructions to the due development of an important branch of national industry.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.—The scheme for the extension of the system of university education has passed the Board of Heads of Houses, and will be brought before Convocation previous to the end of Lent Term. The new plan embraces three public examinations instead of two; one after the fourth term from matriculation, another after the ninth, and a third after the twelfth. The second examination is to be chiefly philosophical, in the introduction of algebra and pure mathematics, in addition to Euclid; and at the third examination, that for degrees, four distinct schools are to be established—viz. in Literæ Humanioribus, in Mathematical and Physical Science, in Natural Philosophy, in Modern History, Philosophy, &c. It will be proposed to award honours both at the second and third examinations; and that the names of all who obtain their testimonia, whether in honours or not, shall be published. The Public Examiners are no longer to be appointed by the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors, but by permanent Boards, composed of the Vice-Chancellor, Proctors, and the Professors of those branches of literature and science which are the subjects of examination.

The Professor of Chemistry will continue his lectures at the new building contiguous to the Botanic Garden, on Wednesday, the 7th of February, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Reader in Experimental Philosophy will commence a course of lectures on light and colours, at the Clarendon, on Wednesday, February 7th, at ten o'clock.

The venerable and learned President of Magdalen College is engaged, it is said, in preparing for the press some observations on Bishop Burnet, and on Mr Macaulay's History of England.

Dean Ireland's Professor of the Exegesis of Holy Scripture proposes, during this term, to read some of St. Paul's Epistles, and to continue his lectures on the Interpretation of the Bible, in the Clarendon, at 2 o'clock, on Tuesday, the 13th of February.

The Camden Professor of Ancient History proposes to deliver a course of lectures during the present term on Greek inscriptions, for the purpose of tracing the progress of Grecian Palæography, of elucidating important points in Athenian history, and of determining the value of Greek Chronicle. The lectures will be delivered on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at 1 o'clock. The first was delivered on Tuesday last.

The Laudian Professor of Arabic will resume his lecture at the Clarendon on Wednesday, the 7th of February, at 3 o'clock

BRISTOL CATHEDRAL.—Dr. Lamb, the Dean of Bristol, has addressed a letter to the editor of the Times, informing him that the only change which has taken place in the performance of the service in the Cathedral is that "the minister, instead of intoning, now reads the prayers, as is the custom at Ely, Rochester, Wells, &c.; Christ Church, Oxford; Trinity and King's College, Cambridge." The precentor of Ely Cathedral has addressed a letter to the Editor of the Times, stating that so far as the practice of that Cathedral is concerned, the Dean of Bristol has been misinformed, as the prayers are there still "intoned."

BISHOP OF EXETER.—The case of the Bishop of Exeter and Mr Gorham came on at the Arches Court on Monday last. The Bishop, as our readers are aware, refused to institute Mr. Gorham to the living of Brampford Speke, Devon, to which he had been presented by the Lord Chancellor, on the ground of unsoundness of doctrine. In the course of Mr. Gorham's answer, it appeared that, in 1846, he was presented by the Crown to the vicarage of Saint John, in the diocese of Exeter, and was instituted by the present Bishop without any previous examination. On receiving his presentation to the vicarage of Brampford Speke, on the 2d of November, 1847, he applied to the Bishop of Exeter for the fit for institution, and on the 8th formally tendered his presentation personally at the Bishop's registry, and an appointment was made by the Bishop for Mr. Gorham to wait upon him on the 12th, but without any mention of the examination, which, however, was notified to him on the 13th of that month. Mr. Gorham repeatedly urged the Bishop to commence his examination at once, but without effect. On the 15th of the following month, December, the Bishop appointed the 17th day, in the course of January. The time limited by the 95th canon, namely, 28 days, had now expired, still Mr. Gorham presented himself for examination under protest. The examination lasted for eight hours on the 17th, for about eleven hours on the 18th, for eight and a half hours on the 20th (the 19th being Sunday), for five hours on the 21st, and for six hours on the 22nd. The examination having been suspended under remonstrance from Mr. Gorham, was resumed on the 8th of March, 1848, and was concluded on the 9th and 10th, on which day it was declared by the Bishop to have ended. Besides these hours so occupied at the Bishop's residence, Mr. Gorham employed portions of the other days in a lodging at Torquay in answering questions proposed by the Bishop, and in perusing a book by which they were accompanied. The general question argued by the counsel for the parties was as to the cessation of the Bishop's right to examine by reason of the lapse of time. Sir H. Jenner Fust said he had not been prepared for this plea in bar, which went to the root of the whole question, and until that was decided it was useless to go into other matters, but would give his opinion on that point the next court day.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE INQUEST AT HACKNEY ON THE TOOTING VICTIMS.—EXTRAORDINARY TERMINATION OF THE PROCEEDINGS.

On Tuesday morning Mr. Baker resumed, for the fourth time, the adjourned inquest, at the Old Mermaid, Hackney, touching the deaths of the two pauper children belonging to the parish of Islington, who died at the temporary asylum, Hackney, in a few hours subsequent to their removal from Mr. Drouet's at Tooting, on the 8th of January.

The Jury having answered to their names,

The Coroner read the following communication, which had just been placed in his hands:—

"Tooting, Jan. 29, 1849.

"SIR,—I am much obliged for your letter of the 26th inst., informing me of another adjournment of the inquest now pending at the Old Mermaid, Hackney. I assure you it was my intention to have been present at the inquest to-morrow (Tuesday), but being unsuccessful in arranging my ball, I am advised by my solicitors to remain away.

"If I am spared, I shall be afford you every explanation and information relative to the late melancholy occurrences, and therefore trust my present unavoidable absence will be deemed sufficient excuse for my adopting their advice.

"I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

"To W. Baker, Esq., Coroner, Old Mermaid, Hackney." "B. P. DROUET."

The Coroner then observed that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the duty on he had come to was to discharge the Jury from further attendance, and thereby dispense with any further inquiry into the matter (sensation), a course which he deemed the fittest both with regard to the individual who was at a short time about to undergo a trial upon a verdict of manslaughter, and the Judges who were to preside over that trial, in order that the course of justice should be rendered quite pure, and left unsullied by any other proceedings arising from a different quarter. After these further observations, he concluded by saying that it only remained for him to discharge the Jury in the usual form.

Mr. Murry (a juror): Pray, is it common to conclude inquiries of this nature in such a singular way?

The Coroner It is quite regular

Mr. King (a juror): I never heard of such a proceeding before. You do this, of course, upon your own responsibility?

The Coroner: The Judges permit a discretion in these cases To be sure, it is not often exercised

A Juror: Can we not return an open verdict?

The Coroner: The inquiry is now finished.

The Foreman: You have certainly taken us by surprise.

A Juror: We were served with our verdict.

The Coroner: The inquiry is over, and the Jury are discharged. I have taken great pains to arrive at a just conclusion, and it is better for all that it should end without unnecessary injury to any person there being no cause for complaint so long as the ends of justice are answered.

The jury were then formally discharged, and thus ended this singular shadow of an inquiry.

The following verdict was handed to the reporters as having been unanimously agreed to by the jury prior to their discharge:—

"We find that the deceased children, John Keen, John Barke, William Keenan, and William Walton, of the parish of Islington, died of cholera, at Hackney, and that the predisposing causes have arisen from bad treatment and neglect on the part of Bartholomew Peter Drouet towards the deceased while in his establishment at Tooting, and that the said Bartholomew Peter Drouet has actuated thereto by mercenary motives."

ANOTHER VERDICT OF MANSLAUGHTER was on Wednesday returned against Mr. Drouet. This second verdict was found by the Jury who have been for some days investigating before Mr. Wakley the cases of the deceased pauper children removed from the asylum at Tooting to Chelsea. The Jury retired at 2 o'clock on Wednesday night, and at 10 o'clock announced their decision as follows:—"We, the Jury, are unanimously of opinion that Bartholomew Peter Drouet is guilty of manslaughter in the cases of Mary Killick, Emma Ingar, and Martha Pollington: that George Hartley died of malignant cholera: That this Jury sincerely regret that the children have been placed at so great a distance from Chelsea as to render it impossible for the parochial visit and pay that attention which they at all times imperatively demand; and the Jury earnestly request that the children be henceforth maintained in their own parish. And the Jury also unanimously express their opinion that the guardians and the Poor-law Commissioners are reprehensible by concurring in allowing the children to remain at Tooting so long after the dreadful mortality had commenced there. The Jury also beg to express their unqualified approbation of the prompt, humane, and beneficial conduct of the Board of Health, respecting the alarming circumstances attendant at Mr. Drouet's establishment at Tooting, and the said Jury urgently recommend the abolition of the system of farming parochial children."

THE TOOTING TRAGEDY.—During the week meetings were held in St. Pancras and other districts of the metropolis, at which resolutions were passed condemnatory of the system of farming out paupers, and of the conduct of the different boards of guardians having children at Tooting, for negligent superintendence. At the St. Pancras meeting a resolution was also carried, pledging the meeting to present a testimonial to the Jury who conducted the investigation which resulted in a verdict of manslaughter against Mr. Drouet.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

METROPOLITAN FINANCIAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.—A meeting was held at the Whittington Club on Monday, to consider the propriety of forming a Metropolitan Financial Reform Association, to act in unison with the Financial Reform Association established at Liverpool and Manchester. Mr. Searl, of Nottingham, moved the first resolution, to the effect—"That, in their visit this country the evils which have been inflicted on other European states, from the want of a wholesome control on the part of the people over their respective governments, it is necessary that the strictest economy should be adopted by our Government; and to secure a continuance of this economy, when obtained, it is indispensably necessary that the House of Commons should be forthwith reformed, until it shall be in a fit state to exercise complete control over the expenditure of the public money." Other resolutions pledged the association to act in unison with such other associations as have been, or may hereafter be instituted. In proposing the fourth resolution, Mr. Hyde called attention to the wonderful effect the creation of forty-shilling freeholders in South Lancashire had produced. Four years and a half ago, that county returned South Lancashire and were defeated. The Anti-Corn Law League set to work, and made forty-shilling freeholders, and at the last election not only did free-trade principles triumph, but that triumph did more to ensure the repeal of the corn laws than all the agitation which had preceded it. He moved, "That it is also necessary to promote throughout the country a well organised system for increasing the number of forty-shilling freeholders in counties, and complete attention to the registration of voters in counties, cities, and boroughs." Mr Dyke, of St. Pancras, bore his testimony to the ease with which forty-shilling freeholders were manufactured, the small sum of 2s. 6d. per week being sufficient. A committee was appointed to carry out the details connected with the formation of the association.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—(From a Correspondent.)—At the weekly meeting of this society, on Thursday night, the President, Lord Mahon, in the chair, there was read the original petition of Leland (believed to be the autograph) to Cardinal Wolsey, dated from the King's Bench Prison, and praying that he (Leland) may be released, and contrasted with the Knight who drew, had charged with conspiracy; and upon which Leland had been previously examined by the Privy Council. The document is indorsed in what is believed to be Wolsey's handwriting.

ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL.—The annual general meeting of the governors of this institution was held on Tuesday evening, at the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road; J. Pritchard, Esq., in the chair. The secretary, Mr. Fenn, read the report, from which it appeared that the total number of patients relieved during the present year was in-door patients 667, out ditto 57,344, making the total number relieved 25,911; being an increase over the preceding year, of in-door patients 23, and out-door 6351. The total receipts for the year amounted to £4691, showing a decrease of £380, as compared with the previous year. The total expenditure amounts to £4843 9s. 8d., including £2093 7s. 7d. paid on account of old debts, which leaves a balance against the institution of £241 17s. 8d. On account of the necessity for practising a rigid economy, the governors had been compelled to keep two of the wards of the hospital unoccupied; nevertheless, they were happy to state that these wards were kept in readiness to receive patients in any case of emergency.

CITY OF LONDON AND EAST LONDON BENEFICIAL INSTITUTION.—A meeting of this valuable charity took place on January 30th, the chair being taken by Henry Richardson, Esq., who announced the following contributions having been paid to the bankers:—Charles Hoar [illegible], Esq., £50; R. S. Halford, Esq., £25 and £5 5s. a year; [illegible] announced the adhesion of the Marquis of Downshire and the Provost of Eton, as Vice-Presidents. Several subscriptions were then entered into, and the meeting adjourned, thanks having been voted to the Chairman.

SALE OF THE STOWE LIBRARY.—THE SECOND PORTION.—On Monday, the sale of the second portion of this magnificent collection of books was commenced by Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, the auctioneers, and again excited considerable attention [illegible] rarest description, and, being illustrated with [illegible] &c., fetched most extraordinary prices. The following were deserving of notice:—"Lysons's Topographical Account of Buckinghamshire," splendidly illustrated with 480 original drawings, many finished in colours, with some hundred shields of arms emblazoned in the margin, of genuine antiquarian interest, connected with the county of Bucks; above 460 plates of maps, views of noted buildings, pedigrees, scarce tracts, poetical broadsides, an autograph letter of Lady Grenville, &c. This matchless collection was formed by the late Lord Grenville, at an unlimited expense. It consists of eight folio volumes, elegantly bound in blue morocco, and was sold yesterday for £246. The purchaser was a stranger in the room, who gave the name of Williams. "Ecclesiastica Gallo-Britannicum, or a Discourse of the Marriage betwixt England and France, with the Portraitures of the Most Illustrious Princes, Charles Prince of Great Britain, and of the Princess Henrietta Maria, daughter of France, with the Arms and Marriages passed betwixt England and France: printed in 1625." This gallant and noble work, a rare print was executed by Hollar, and from which relate to Charles I. The Discourse (which is dedicated to the Duke of Buckingham) is printed in quarto, but has been laid in large folio to correspond with the plates. "Historical Collections of the Most Remarkable Passages of Charles I. and his Queen, surrounded with engravings of coats of arms. At the bottom are twenty-two verses subscribed. "Are to be sold by Thomas Basset, at the Signe of the Half-Moone in Chancery Lane, over against Fleet-street, and Bromley. Mr. Thorpe was the purchaser of it, for the sum of £21 10s. "The London Gazette, from 1665 to 1689, the first twenty-three numbers being called the Oxford Gazette," sold for £6 12s. 6d. "Manners and Household Expenses of England in the 13th and 15th centuries," one of the rare publications of the Roxburghe Club, sold for £4 4s.—"Lyson's (Daniel) Environs of London and the Middlesex Parishes; forming an Historical Account of the Towns, Villages, and Hamlets within 12 miles of that capital." This work, originally published in 6 vols., was enlarged to 18 quarto vols., on large paper, by the insertion of upwards of 1000 original drawings, of churches, seats, old houses, churches, &c., above 800 portraits, and 600 maps, views, churches, public places, &c. This, perhaps the most perfect work relating to the county of Middlesex, sold for £213. The other books sold fetched equally good prices, and the day's sale produced the large sum of £1005 17s.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—It appears from the report of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, just issued, that to the 31st of January, 1848, the purchase-money paid for metropolitan improvements amounted to £877,818; and that there remained to be completed to the date mentioned one purchase to the amount of £500, which had been agreed for, but the purchase-money had not been paid. The money (£727,618) was expended in the following manner: In the line from Oxford-street to Holborn, £260,327 4s 10d; in the line from Bow-street to Charlotte-street, Bloomsbury, £96,408 11s.; in the line from London Docks to St. Katherine's Church, £139,341 8s. 6d.; in the line from Coventry-street in Long-acre, £170,543 3s. 8d.; and in the line from East Smithfield to Rosemary-lane, £22,247 18s.

THE CHIEF BAILIFFSHIP OF THE CITY SHERIFF'S COURT.—The Court of Aldermen and Common Council have appointed an early day this month to appoint a high bailiff of the new court for small debts—the New "Sheriff's Court." It will be remembered that Mr Wood, the son of ex-Alderman Wood, was the first chief bailiff elected, but was suspended. The Court has also decided that being an attorney shall not be a necessary qualification, and that the chief bailiff shall, when necessary, personally enforce the process of the Court. The Judge of the Court has recommended Mr Norton, the present candidate on the first election, the applicant having been many years principal officer of the old Sheriff's Court, and not provided for by the new Act, whilst all other officers of the Court of Requests received compensation.

VAGRANCY.—A deputation waited by appointment upon the President of the Poor-Law Board, at Somerset-house, on Saturday last, to make some suggestions on the subject of vagrancy, arising out of the present state of trade and an important meeting of chairmen and clerks of unions which recently took place at Stoke-upon-Trent. The gentlemen who attended were Mr. [illegible] jun., of Stoke; Mr. Hay, of Pembridge; Mr. Lawrence, of Lichfield, and Mr. Latham, of Congleton. The President paid great attention to the statements addressed by the deputation, showing that some decided steps should be taken to suppress the growing evil of mendicancy in the country, and creating an efficient police surveillance distinct from the Poor-Law, and promised his immediate and careful attention to them. Several other matters of importance connected with the administration of the Poor-Laws were discussed, and the deputation retired, after a lengthened interview.

FIRE AT THE EAST LONDON BAZAAR.—On Monday evening, between six and seven o'clock, a fire broke out in the place of merchandise used by the Jewish persuasion for the disposal of wearing-apparel, known as the East London Bazaar, situate in Royal Mint-street, Minories. The premises, which covered an area of several hundred square feet, contained, at the time of the outbreak, the stock in trade of a large number of Jewish salesmen and general dealers. Information of the occurrence was promptly forwarded to the principal stations, and six or seven engines were quickly despatched to the scene of conflagration. The firemen, upon forcing the doors, found a number of crates filled with goods, as well as several of the counters on fire; a general blaze at the same time was extending along the roof with great rapidity; and, in spite of the torrents of water being scattered over the flames, it was not until past eight o'clock that they were safely extinguished, and not until a very considerable quantity of property had been destroyed, and the building extensively burned.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS, &c.—During the week ending Saturday, Jan. 27, the births registered in the metropolis were—Males, 1414; females, 1362: total, 2776. Deaths Males, 873; females, 635: total, 1508. The number of deaths from cholera is 45, being a decrease of 17 and 49 respectively on the two previous weeks. Of 741 deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs, 470 occurred on the south side of the Thames. Of the 45 deaths, last week from cholera, 14 occurred in the district of Wandsworth and Clapham, of which two were in the institution at Tooting. The total number of deaths in this house, or among children who have been removed from it, registered in four weeks, amounts to 158, of which 138 were returned as caused by cholera. The [illegible] ascribed to dysentery, mesenteric disease, &c. The deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs were 246, almost the same as the average, having been 238 and 300, the numbers of the two former weeks; while the mean daily temperature ranged from 24.6° on the 24 day of the month to 49.6° on the 25th. 329 deaths were caused by the epidemic class of diseases, making an increase on the average of 198 [illegible] of these 76 were from scarlatina, or 44 more than the average; [illegible] typhus, or 14 more than the average; while 22 persons died of diarrhœa and dysentery, the weekly average being 14. The 1508 deaths registered in the week show an increase of 39 on the average of five winters, but give a more favourable result than was obtained in the two previous weeks, when they were respectively 1448 and 1345.

DR SMITH.

JOHN SMITH, LL.D., of Cruttherland, Secretary of the Maitland Club, and formerly a magistrate of Glasgow, and an eminent publisher there; was a man of far-spread literary distinction. RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

EXTENSION OF THE GREAT WESTERN TO WINDSOR.—The works on the extension of the Great Western from Slough to Windsor are proceeding actively. Excavators have commenced the cuttings, and the occupiers of property [illegible] The [illegible] Station [illegible] the London and [illegible] [illegible] £17,000 to £1410, and that of the coke ovens from £150 to £100.

ECONOMY PER MILE.—The reduction in the price of coal contemplated by the Eastern Counties Railway Company's extension line to Shoreham Court was opened to the public on Thursday. There is to be a service of five trains a day to accommodate the pleasure traffic.

SHREWSBURY AND CHESTER.—This company have successfully appealed against the setting of their line in the township Gwersyllt. The parish rated it at £120 per mile, the Wrexham Petty Sessions reduced it to £50 per mile.

SOUTH DEVON.—On Sunday morning, soon after the passing of the down mail train, an immense stone or block of rock fell from the Hi[illegible] Head Cliff, bounding over without injuring the atmospheric pipes, but, pitching across the entire line, damaged the engine of the train for upward of an hour. Men, however, were set to work, and the huge mass, upwards of seven tons, was broken to pieces, and the line again cleared. A policeman is constantly stationed near this spot, as rock are continually falling.

GIGANTIC SCHEME.—The Rhenish Democrat states that a gigantic project, the construction of a canal between Kiel and the mouth of the Elbe, connecting the Baltic with the North Sea, is seriously contemplated. The reason assigned is the frustration of the monopoly of the passages of the Sound and the two Belts, at present enjoyed by the Scandinavian Powers. Without some such independent communication the creation of a German fleet would be vain.

THE "SLAVE MOTHER CROSSING THE OHIO.—We remember (says a writer in the Free American) the story of a cruel master who, without cause, had determined to sever a slave mother from her only child. She had been faithful under the very worst usage, and she determined to remain so, until he told her that on the morrow her child must be borne to New Orleans, to be sold there in the slave mart. It was mid-winter. The earth was frosted with a hard crust, and the two Belts, at present enjoyed by the Scandinavian Powers. Without some such independent communication the creation of a German fleet would be vain.

THE "SLAVE MOTHER CROSSING THE OHIO.—We remember (says a writer in the Free American) the story of a cruel master who, without cause, had determined to sever a slave mother from her only child. She had been faithful under the very worst usage, and she determined to remain so, until he told her that on the morrow her child must be borne to New Orleans, to be sold there in the slave mart. It was mid-winter. The earth was frosted with a hard crust, and at midnight she started for the Ohio, determined, if she could, to live and die with her child. She reached its banks as the pursuers rose the hill beyond it. A boat was near; masses of broken ice were sluggishly drifting along; what was she to do? Trusting in Heaven, she put her feet on the treacherous element, and with it bending and breaking beneath her [illegible] on either side appearing to see her and her child sinking at every moment), she boldly pushed on from cake to cake till she had landed safely on the Ohio shore. Five minutes sooner, and she must have perished; two minutes later, and she would have met with a watery grave; for before she had proceeded twenty steps the ice behind her, close on the Kentucky side, had broken, and was scattered ere she reached the mid-river. "Thank God, you and your child are safe," exclaimed the hard-hearted master, as he saw her land, rejoiced that he had escaped the responsibility of their death. "Brave woman," said a Kentuckian, who had witnessed her escape, and met her at the landing. "You have won your freedom, and shall have it." The mother and child were kept together, and liberty and love are now their lot in their humble but happy home.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT BY HER MAJESTY.

THE ROBING OF HER MAJESTY, IN THE VICTORIA LOBBY OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

HURSDAY, her Majesty opened the Session of Parliament in person. The doors were opened at 12 o'clock, and ladies, in full dress, continued to arrive in quick succession, until every seat was occupied, and some were compelled to stand, for want of room.

The 1st Regiment of Foot Guards was stationed opposite the entrance of the House of Lords, and the Horse Guards lined the road from the Palace.

Shortly after one o'clock the Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers, the Cabinet Ministers, and other great officers of State, entered the house.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Master of the Horse and the Mistress of the Robes, left Buckingham Palace at 20 minutes before two, in the state carriage, drawn by eight cream-coloured horses, and proceeded through the Park to the House of Lords. A very large crowd was drawn together to witness the procession, lining the entire way from the Palace to the Parliament House; the whole of the windows whence a view of the procession could be obtained being filled with splendidly-dressed ladies, who repeatedly cheered her Majesty and her illustrious Consort as they proceeded through Whitehall and Parliament-street to the house.

Her Majesty arrived at the House about twenty minutes past two, when her arrival was immediately announced by a discharge of cannon. Soon afterwards the trumpets sounded, and the procession entered the house, led by the Heralds in their State tabards, followed by the Lord Chancellor and the Great Officers of State, her Majesty's robe being borne by six pages. Prince Albert took his place on the left of the Queen, who proceeded to the Throne and took her seat, all the Peers and Peeresses rising, but taking their seats on her Majesty commanding them to be seated.

The Lord Chancellor then delivered the Royal Speech to her Majesty, who commanded the Commons to be sent for. They immediately appeared at the bar, headed by the Speaker, attired in his State robes, when her Majesty, with her usual distinctness, read the following most gracious Speech:—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The period being arrived at which the business of Parliament is usually resumed, I have called you together for the discharge of your important duties.

"It is satisfactory to me to be enabled to state that both in the north and in the south of Europe the contending parties have consented to a suspension of arms for the purpose of negotiating terms of peace.

"The hostilities carried on in the Island of Sicily were attended with circumstance so revolting, that the British and French Admirals were impelled, by motives of humanity, to interpose, and to stop the further effusion of blood.

"I have availed myself of the interval thus obtained, to propose, in conjunction with France, to the King of Naples, an arrangement calculated to produce a permanent settlement of affairs in Sicily. The negotiation on these matters is still pending.

"It has been my anxious endeavour, in offering my good offices to the various contending Powers, to prevent the extension of the calamities of war, and to lay the foundations for lasting and honourable peace. It is my constan desire to maintain with all Foreign States the most friendly relations.

"As soon as the interests of the public service will permit, I shall direct the papers connected with these transactions to be laid before you.

"A rebellion of a formidable character has broken out in the Punjaub, and the Governor-General of India has been compelled, for the preservation of the peace of the country, to assemble a considerable force, which is now engaged in military operations against the insurgents. But the tranquillity of British India has not been affected by these unprovoked disturbances.

"I again commend to your attention the restrictions imposed on commerce by the Navigation Law

"If you shall find that these laws are in whole or in part unnecessary for the maintenance of our maritime power, while they fetter trade and industry, you will no doubt deem it right to repeal or modify their provisions.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have directed the Estimates for the service of the year to be laid before you they will be framed with the most anxious attention to a wise economy.

"The present aspect of affairs has enabled me to make large reductions on the Estimates of last year

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I observe with satisfaction that this portion of the United Kingdom has remained tranquil amidst the convulsions which have disturbed so many parts o Europe.

"The insurrection in Ireland has not been renewed; but a spirit of disaffection still exists, and I am compelled, to my great regret, to ask for a continuance, for a limited time, of those powers which in the last session you deemed necessary for the preservation of the public tranquillity.

"I have great satisfaction in stating that commerce is reviving from those shocks which, at the commencement of last session, I had to deplore.

"The condition of the manufacturing districts is likewise more encouraging than it has been for a considerable period.

"It is also gratifying to me to observe that the state of the revenue is one progressive improvement.

"I have to lament, however, that another failure in the potato crop has caused very severe distress in some parts of Ireland.

"The operation of the laws for the relief of the poor in Ireland will properly be a subject of your inquiry; and any measure by which those laws may be beneficially amended, and the condition of the people may be improved, wil receive my cordial assent.

"It is with pride and thankfulness that I advert to the loyal spirit of my people, and that attachment to our institutions which has animated them during a period of commercial difficulty, deficient production of food, and political revolution

"I look to the protection of Almighty d for favour in our continued progress, and I trust that you will assist me in upholding the fabric of the Constitution, founded as it is upon the principles of freedom and of justice."

Her Majesty having retired, the House adjourned during pleasure, and assembled again at five o'clock, at which time there were an unusually large number of Peers present.

THE ADDRESS

Her Majesty's Speech having been read by the Lord Chancellor and the Clerk at the table,

Earl Fortescue rose to move the Address in answer to the Speech from the

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT BY HER MAJESTY.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE QUEEN ON THE THRONE RECEIVING THE SPEECH FROM THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

Throne, and, after claiming the indulgence of the House as being the first occasion on which he had had the honour of addressing them, he proceeded to notice the leading points referred to in the Royal Speech, congratulating their Lordships that they had not only been able to maintain peace at home, but that their intervention had had the effect of putting a stop to the sanguinary conflicts that had been for some time raging in Schleswig-Holstein, and in the south of Europe. It was an additional satisfaction to them to find that while they had been enabled to maintain the public tranquillity, and while the whole European Continent was in a state of agitation or insurrection, the expenditure of this country was in process of reduction in almost every department. At the same time, he trusted that no considerable diminution of the naval or military strength would be attempted; but that Great Britain would still be enabled to maintain that bold and determined front which was the best guarantee for the preservation of peace. He was pleased to find that the friendly disposition that had been evinced by the French Government had been borne out by the reductions that had recently been suggested in their military force; and he was satisfied that it would be responded to in a similar spirit by this country. The noble Earl then referred to the gratifying increase that was visible in the revenue of the country, and to the disturbances that had taken place in Ireland, which had been put down by the energy of the Executive, and the good feeling and loyalty of the great bulk of the population of that country. After referring to the deaths which had taken place since that House had last met, and paying a handsome tribute to the late Lord Auckland, Viscount Melbourne, and Lord George Bentinck, the noble Earl concluded by moving the Address, which was, as usual, an echo of the Speech.

Lord DATRNE seconded the Address, which, in his great satisfaction at the tranquility which prevailed throughout every part of the kingdom, and which strikingly contrasted with the disturbances and troubles that prevailed abroad. It was extremely gratifying to find that the interposition of the British Cabinet had had the effect of suspending hostilities in both the north and south of Europe, and that negotiations were now pending which would have the effect he hoped of bringing about an amicable arrangement. The noble Lord then referred to the unhappy state of Ireland, and expressed a hope that the Government would be enabled to devise measures during the present session which would have the effect of restoring order, tranquility, and industry. He deprecated any considerable reduction of their naval or military forces; and after some other remarks upon the leading topics referred to in the Speech, concluded by seconding the Address

Lord BROUGHAM said it was a subject of most unfeigned satisfaction to him to agree with the mover and seconder in the general sentiments which they had expressed. He feared they took too sanguine a view of the improvement in their commercial and manufacturing department, and objected to their taking credit for a sum of £2,000,000 paid on corn, duty which he fully expected to be repealed in that very day. He then referred to the new league which had been set on foot, apparently for the purpose of effecting a reduction of the expenditure of the country, but having really very questionable and very pernicious objects in view. It was directed against the landed interest, and he for one would take his stand against this crusade as the very outset. The noble and learned Lord then proceeded to point out the various burdens and taxes imposed on the land, and contended that the money-holder was in a much better position than the landholders. He thought it right on the very first occasion that presented itself to expose the delusion and the deception that were attempted to be practised. He then referred to the state of France, and observed that matters were in so precarious a position in that country, that it was impossible to say what events a few days or hours might bring forth, and that, under such circumstances, it would be extremely impolitic and injudicious in this country to reduce her defences. He also suggested the expediency of maintaining the most amicable and intimate relations with Austria and Russia, who were their natural allies, and could never come into contact with them. The noble and learned Lord concluded by complaining of the bungling manner in which the state prosecutions in Ireland had been conducted, and observed that it appeared to him that new lawyers were as much required in Ireland as new laws and improved legislation.

Lord HEATHFIELD agreed in much that had fallen from Lord Brougham, and was sorry to differ from him upon any point; but with regard to our interference in the affairs of Sicily and Naples, he would say, that so far from disapproving the British Government had gone too far, his opinion being that he had acted up to the obligations imposed upon them by the treaty of 1815!

The Marl of WINCHILSEA deprecated any reduction of the naval or military establishments of the country, which, in the present state of the Continent, would be nothing short of a great public calamity. The noble Earl also complained of the depressed state in which the agricultural interest was placed, and trusted that some measures would be devised to relieve it from the burdens which it laboured under.

Lord STANLEY said the Government was mistaken in supposing that his noble and learned friend (Lord Brougham) was at all disposed to support the policy which they had been pursuing. Although the Speech from the Throne was apparently satisfactory, he considered that it did not bear out the favourable view that had been therein given of the position of the country at home and abroad. He thought their foreign policy had been most injurious, and that their interference had been, in every instance, attended with the most unfortunate results. After referring to the case of Sicily and Schleswig-Holstein, the noble Lord adverted to the trade and commerce of the country, which, he regretted to say, was in a most depressed state, notwithstanding the sanguine hopes that were contained in the Speech from the Throne. He observed that the large revenue which had hitherto been obtained from the duty on corn would terminate with the present day, and he would call their Lordships' attention to the anomalous

The emigrant ship Atlantic, Captain Ross, which sailed from Liverpool for New Orleans on Friday, the 12th ult., has been run on shore near Arcrossan and gone to pieces. The Atlantic had no less than 400 emigrants on board, and, considering the tempestuous weather through which she passed prior to the accident, it is somewhat wonderful that no lives were lost.

The original floor of the ancient refectory at Durham has been discovered. About a foot and a half below the joists was a uniform surface of rubbish, on removing a portion of which, to the depth of about three feet, the workmen struck upon the floor of the ancient refectory. It is composed of plain red encaustic tiles, about ten inches square, and of much rougher composition than is now deemed requisite.

There are 14,000 paupers receiving out-door relief in the Listowell union, besides 2000 paupers now in the workhouse.

In consequence of the apprehension felt amongst the people about the security of savings' banks in Ireland, the directors of the National Bank of Ireland have resolved to take deposits as low as 1s.

Such was the boisterous and unpropitious state of the weather for shipping at the close of last week, that no less than nine or ten of the coal trading vessels which left Whitehaven Harbour on Saturday for Dublin, were obliged to retrace their courses back again to that port on the following day, there to await with patience, and to be thankful for their safety.

On Thursday, last week, the Rev. Mr. Carwell, Rector of St. Martin's, Looe, Cornwall, went with his two sons to a pond, a short distance from his house, the elder son having a gun loaded with swan-shot. Hopes are entertained that the shot may be absorbed safely.

"Woodsocknensi."—Better than some of the last, but still below the standard.

"J. R. E."—Very pretty. It shall have an early place.

"G. S.," Dauphin.—There is no corrected edition of the book mentioned, although it is certainly called for, as it contains a copious crop of errors, clerical and typographical. Thanks for the little Enigma, which, although not difficult, is ingenious

"J. C.," Penzance—It is not possible for Black to prolong the mate beyond six moves in Problem No. 265, if White play properly. See our solution

"Julius Cæsar."—The King is not restricted to moving merely when he is checked or takes a piece. Get some elementary work on the game

"Ludus Latrunculorum"—The Bishop and Knight are about of equal value, but the worth of either is so much dependent on the circumstances in which they have to act, that it is quite impossible to determine accurately which is the superior piece. At the beginning of a game the Bishop is, perhaps, the stronger; while, at the end, many players prefer a Knight.

"Diurus"—At an expense of space which we could very ill afford, we gave you a solution with variations of the Enigma mentioned. That surely ought to have satisfied. The other two solutions shall appear next week.

"A Young Chess-Player."—We have no space to give you the information asked for, but it is easily attainable. Why do you not get Bohn's "Chess-Player's Handbook," or some other elementary work on the game?

"Pulcher."—1. The three Chess-Engravings you mention, namely, "The Grand Match between England and France," and Frank Stone's "Impending Mate" and "Mated," can be got, we should suppose, of any Printseller. 2. The Portrait of "Philidor," by Zoffani, has not, that we are aware of, been engraved; but a very good likeness of him appeared in Le Palamède, two or three years back.

"John," "S. T. By a sort of "Sweepstakes," sufficient money has been raised to give three small prizes, for which there were twelve competitors, all habitues of the Divan: viz. Messrs. Bird, Buckle, Finch, Flower, Jones, G. Medley, J. Medley, Simonds, South, Turdeit, Williams, and Wyse. These having been paired by lot, played together last week, and the six winners have again cast lots, and are pitted thus: Buckle v. Williams, Tuckett v. J. Medley, and G. Medley v. Jones. We look forward with some interest to the result of the final struggle, and shall be enabled, doubtless, in our next, to give the names of the three successful players

"Mars."—It shall be definitively reported on next week.

"Ignoramus."—Get some modern Treatise on the game. Philidor's work was serviceable in his time, but it is pretty well obsolete now.

"L. N."—We have not yet seen the last Number of the New Series of "Le Palamède," and doubt if it has yet appeared. You must have the goodness to write out the position you wish solved.

"J. H. T."—You are quite mistaken in supposing the solution of Problem No. 261 to be imperfect. The two moves you suggest for Black would be of no avail. Look at the position again.

"A. J. H." is thanked; but Problems so fettered by restrictions, however ingenious, are not suited to our paper

PROBLEM No. 262.—The beauty and difficulty of this position are greatly enhanced by placing the White Pawn (as Mr. Harrwitz informs us he intended it) on the White King's 7th, instead of Queen's 7th square. Recommending this alteration, we shall withhold the Solution till our next Number.

(a) This move was first introduced by Mr Schulten, of the New York Chess Club, in a match played with Mr Stanley, and has excited much attention in the Chess World

(b) With reference to this move Mr. Staunton writes (see "Chess-Player's Handbook" lately published in London): "It is idle after move of Kt. Q B to B 3d, which gives such a split to the preliminary play of it. Q R to Q B 4th. We were one of the same opinion ourselves, but have long ago arrived at the conclusion that White should now lose the game like "falling off a log."

COURT OF CHANCERY

PRINCE ALBERT v. STRANGE—INJUNCTION AGAINST THE PUBLICATION OF A DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE. This motion to dissolve an injunction granted, and afterwards continued by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, was opened on Friday se'nnight, and the arguments were continued on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday, when they were at last brought to a close. As the case has been so recently before the public, it is only necessary to state that the injunction was granted on the 25th of October, upon the original bill of his Royal Highness supported by four affidavits made by himself, by Hon. Mr. Anson, and a Mr. White. The terms of that injunction were in substance to restrain the defendant Strange, who is a bookseller and publisher, from exhibiting to the public, as he proposed, a collection of etchings (63 or 64 in all), purporting to be the works of the Queen and of the Prince, and alleged in the bill to have been surreptitiously obtained by the defendant, and also to restrain him from publishing a descriptive catalogue of the same. The bill was afterwards amended by making a Mr. Judge a party defendant, and introducing allegations into the bill to the effect that the etchings had been improperly procured by him from one Middleton, who was in the employment of Mr. Brown, a printer in Windsor, employed by her Majesty and the Prince to print off copies of the etchings, or engravings made from them. The bill, as amended, stated that the etchings were sent to Mr. Brown and returned, but except on that occasion they were always kept in the private possession of her Majesty at the palace. Several copies of some of the engravings were given in the private friends of her Majesty and of the Prince. The defendant Strange put in his answer to the amended bill in December, and a motion was made on his behalf on the 15th of that month to dissolve so much of the injunction as restrained him from publishing the descriptive catalogue. In deference to her Majesty's and the Prince's wishes he submitted to the other parts of the injunction. The Vice-Chancellor refused the motion, and continued the injunction in its full extent as first granted. The present motion was an appeal from that judgment, and was confined to the partial dissolution of the injunction, that is, the restraint on the publication of the descriptive catalogue. The motion was made on behalf of the defendant Strange only. At the close of the arguments on Tuesday, the Lord Chancellor said he would give his judgment on the first day of the sittings after term (the 5th instant).

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

IN RE W. H. BARBER.—Mr. Sergeant Wilkins applied for an order to be directed to the Registrar, to show if there existed any cause why Mr. W. Barber should not be entitled to his certificate. Mr. Barber's affidavit set forth that he had been articled and duly served his time to Mr. Lowndes, of Tunbridge; that he was admitted an attorney in Easter Term, 1836, and continued to practise up to the month of December, 1843, when he was apprehended on a charge of forgery; that he was tried and convicted at the Central Criminal Court, in 1844, and since that time he had never taken out his certificate; that on the 3d of November, 1848, he received her Majesty's most gracious pardon; and on the 10th of the same month a full and free pardon, with liberty to return to England. The affidavit then went on to state that Mr. Barber denied all guilty knowledge and participation in the transaction upon which he had been found guilty. He now sought to be re-admitted, to be enabled to obtain a livelihood. Sir F. Thesiger, who was instructed to oppose the application, said it was necessary that some further inquiries into the character of Mr. Barber should be made before he was admitted.—Lord Denman inquired if there could be any objection to such a proposal?—Mr. Sergeant Wilkins replied that Mr. Barber was anxious for a full and searching investigation, for the more his case was gone into the clearer would his conscience appear; at the same time, he hoped it would be done at once, as Mr. Barber was now depending on his friends for the support of himself and family.—Lord Denman: The inquiry must proceed immediately. Mr. Sergeant Wilkins wished to know who were to make the inquiries?—Lord Denman: It will be made by one of the Masters of the Court.—It was then arranged that the application should be renewed at the commencement of next term.

BAIL COURT.

THE TOOTING CASE.—On Tuesday the Court granted the application to admit Drouet to bail, the amount required being, the defendant himself in £200, and two sureties in £100 each, or four sureties in £50 each. Drouet accordingly, with his four sureties, entered into the required recognizance.

IRELAND.

MR. DUFFY'S TRIAL.—On Thursday (last week) an application to admit Mr. Duffy to bail was made to the Queen's Bench. The application was grounded upon an affidavit embracing two points: the one was a matter of law, arising on the construction of the Habeas Corpus Act; the other was, whether, in the exercise of the discretion of the Court, the party should not be admitted to bail on the facts. The affidavit recited all the very tedious proceedings in the case, and concluded with a certificate, signed by Dr. Graves, by which that eminent physician stated that he had visited Mr. Duffy, whose health was much impaired by confinement, want of exercise, &c., and that a change of air was absolutely necessary towards restoring the prisoner to convalescence. The Court refused the application.

WINTER EMIGRATION.—In all parts of the country farmers are still emigrating to considerable numbers. The Anglo-Celt has the following account from the northern county of Cavan:—"Emigration is proceeding at a rapid rate in this county. Some days ago ten families left the small village of Redhills for the United States. You could scarcely travel a mile in any of our leading roads but you would meet two or three car-loads of people all eager to escape from the land of their birth, to push their fortunes in Transatlantic climes. If emigration proceed at this rate, we shall not have hands enough to till the ground. Those who are going are our able-bodied and moneyed labourers."

INTOLERANCE OF A SCOTCH MILITARY OFFICER.—A week or two back, a publican named Dunbar, a native of Scotland, who was in command of a detachment of the 66th Regiment, during Divine Service at the Roman Catholic Chapel at Newcastle, suddenly stood up, while the Rev. Mr. Coll, the officiating priest, was preaching, and in a manner insulting to the clergyman and his congregation, ordered the soldiers out of the place of worship. The clergyman, unconscious of having given any cause in his sermon for such inexcusable conduct on the part of the officer, sent a written complaint to the Commander of the Forces in Ireland, accompanied with a sketch of his sermon, shewing its inoffensiveness to any person. An inquiry into the case was immediately ordered, and the following result has been communicated by the Rev. Mr. Coll, in a letter to the Dublin Evening Post:—

"Newcastle, Jan. 28, 1849.

"My dear Sir,—On yesterday, at five o'clock, I had the honour of a visit from Colonel Fox, the quartermaster-general of the Limerick district, who said he came by Sir Edward Blakeney's order, to inform me of his decision on my recent appeal to him respecting the conduct of Ensign Dunbar, of the 66th. His then proceeded to read, in the presence of Mr. Gordon, the officer who accompanied him, and both my coadjutors, the official communication he had received; the substance of which was, that Sir Edward concurred in the opinion expressed by Colonel Cox, in his previous report, that, as Dean Coll did not speak upon any political subject, Mr. Dunbar was not justified in removing the men from the chapel—that he was sorry the congregation had been alarmed, and considered the interruption by that proceeding—that he directed Colonel Cox to caution Mr. Dunbar, an officer of one year's standing, against such conduct in future. When Colonel Cox had finished reading the official document, he said, 'Mr. Dunbar is now very sorry for the occurrence, I assure you, sir.' I trust this contrition will prove so enduring as I believe it to be sincere, and remain, dear sir, with sincere respect, yours,

"THOMAS COLL."

INCENDIARISM.—Incendiarism still continues in the north. Within two miles of Belfast the criminal discharge has been doing their work of mischief in the open day. A public meeting was held in Belfast on Thursday week, the Mayor in the chair, and strong resolutions were passed. The stacks of a Captain Gardner were a few days back fired, and the property is surrounded by the Belfast papers) says: "Miss Grace M'Veigh's laurels have been torn down, by the same fiend also. The fine young lady seems to have riddled with shot, to assist in making the story appear like truth"

HAMPTON COURT BRANCH OF THE LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY.

THIS holiday railway is now completed, and was opened for traffic on Thursday. It is but a mile and a half in length, and branches from off the South-Western line, thirteen miles from the metropolis, or a mile beyond the Kingston station. It consists nearly of one continuous line of embankment, eighteen feet in height, graduating from the main line until it crosses the river Mole, and reaches level ground close to the foot of Hampton Bridge.

Our view shows the Hampton station, a not inpicturesque structure in the old English style, of deep red brick, with stone dressings. Thence across the bridge to the palace is less than five minutes' walk; so that, notwithstanding several stoppages, you may reach Hampton Court from the Waterloo station in less than three quarters of an hour

This new branch is expected to be a lucrative addition to the main line, since it appears, from the Government returns, that 178,000 persons annually visit Hampton court Palace. There are to be five trains a-day from the Waterloo Station, and an equal number back, including one Parliamentary or penny-a-mile train.

Apart from this convenience, the scenery of this short branch has some fine bits of landscape, with occasional glimpses of the river and the massive palace. Hence, we have speed and the enjoyment of pleasing country combined in this new accommodation.

HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA, AND HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS ALBERT, PRINCE OF WALES.

[This very interesting Picture is from the Miniature exquisitely painted by Thorburn; engraved by Ryall; and published by Hering and Remington, Regent-street, by whose permission it has been here copied. The Picture is a successful adaptation of the manner of middle-age art; and the Plate is dedicated, by special Permission, to his Majesty the King of Prussia, Sponsor to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.]

The storms that shake from other brows the crown,
Like fruit wind-scatter'd after sudden blight,
But give her diadem a new renown,
A firmer hold, a more resplendent light.
Each bosom, glowing with a patriot flame,
Becomes a fortress to defend her cause;
And all men's voices, at Victoria's name,
Add the heart's homage to the tongue's applause.

And while the gentle mother claims the meed
Of loving homage from her subject lands,—
Homage not forced, but free in word and deed,—
A bud of promise grows beneath her hands.
Upon his youthful head what hopes arise
From all the myriads of our towns and dales!
The artless cynosure of English eyes,
Treasure of English hearts—the Prince of Wales.

Who rules o'er slaves by force and tyranny,
May fall, though armies prop him on his throne,
Who rules by love a nation of the free,
Shall stand without them—safe, although alone.

So hast thou stood, Fair Monarch of the Isles!
So shalt thou stand! Long may thy gentle face
Wear, on unfurrow'd cheeks, those genial smiles—
The Queen's adornment and the Woman's grace.

Woman and Queen! The very words shall teach
Respect for her, who knows and proves so well
The duty, charm, and dignity of each,
And binds all hearts by Love's triumphant spell.
Long may her modest hand the Sceptre bear!
Long may the Crown adorn her brow serene!
And the glad nation breathe the grateful prayer—
God bless the Woman! Heaven preserve the Queen!—M

WRECK OF THE "TIGRESS," OFF THE ROUND-DOWN CLIFF, DOVER.

WRECK OF "THE TIGRESS."

On Sunday night week, the East Indiaman the Tigress, went on shore to the westward of the Shakspeare Cliff, Dover; in a few days she became a total wreck, and portions of her cargo strewed the beach as far as the South Foreland. The prospect of booty attracted hundreds of the lower orders, men, women, and children, to the shore, eager to possess themselves of floating pieces of the wrecked ship, spices, cocoa-nuts, or anything else that came in their way, to make lawful prize; and, unfortunately, in one or two instances, despite the vigilance of the officers of customs and coast-guard boatmen, casks or puncheons of rum, which had been washed ashore, were stove in, and the contents carried off in the crowns of hats, in boots, or any available article at hand; and a disgusting scene of drunkenness ensued—men, women, and children lying on the beach, huddled together in the worst state of intoxication so that many of them were nearly drowned by the rising of the tide, whilst others were rendered so insensible through the drink, that they were removed on shutters. It was reported during the past week that one or two persons were missing, and it is feared that they were not removed high enough up the beach to prevent their bodies being caught by the flow of the sea. This scene was likely to have been repeated within the last few days by another puncheon of rum coming ashore; but the coast-guard, arriving in time after it had been broached, succeeded in overturning it into the sea—a charitable rescue to many.

Our Artist has sketched the wrecked vessel, as she lay in front of the Round-down Cliff, close by the South-Eastern Railway.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

Friendly parties, private balls, and a few public fêtes, have at length enlivened the mysteries of fashion in Paris. Evening dress is of the most varied description: there are as many heavy materials worn as light ones, such as tulle or crape. The ornament for dresses of moyen antique, damask, and satin consists still of lace: however, some satin dresses are trimmed with very open tulle tuns, a white satin dress is covered with five flounces of tulle, each edged with three rows of extremely narrow ribbon. Trimmings of tulle invariably ornament the bodices of these dresses; the sleeves are very small, covered with three frills of tulle. A pink satin dress, trimmed with seven little flounces of pink crape, is a charming toilette de bal, which is completed by a wreath of honeysuckle, pink and violet de Parme, placed at the summit.

HEAD DRESS OF THE PRINCESS DEMIDOFF.

A few Louis XIV. toilettes may be seen at splendid entertainments, where the fashion of the day consists of an assemblage of all the modes de l'Empire; and we can recommend a beautiful toilette of this kind, composed of a coiffure rather low behind, and the hair waved, projecting very much over the ears, ornamented on each side with a little feather, placed above the ears under the twist, and thus trimming the back of the head-dress. A robe de moire antique (a kind of silk stuff watered), sky blue, with white and blue shaded flowers, trimmed up the front with two rows of lace, point d'Alençon, separated by a little wreath of small ribbon buckles, à la Louis XIV., that is to say, with little buckles of ribbon placed one just above the other, gradually diminished in size towards the top of the skirt. A berthe of two rows of lace, like that on the skirt, is caught up on the shoulders by the same little wreath of narrow ribbon quilling, which there terminates by a bow à la Louis XIV.

Dark ladies wear bright yellow satin dresses, which have an extraordinary effect: the skirts of these dresses are trimmed with a tulle flounce, edged with five little rolls of satin; and a second skirt of tulle falls nearly to the top of the flounce, trimmed, also, with five little rolls of satin. The double berthe is of tulle, edged with rows of satin. The bouquets for the bodice are always to match the flowers in the hair. With these bright yellow dresses is worn a mixture of red flowers, green oats, and a few light stalks of sorbier rouge.

The gloves are always worn short, with three buttons towards the top of the wrist. It is good taste to wear them without trimming, but then several bracelets are worn on each arm.

The bouquets for the hand do not diminish in size; the most remarkable are composed of a single kind of flower, interspersed with heath. Fans are also as indispensable at a ball as flowers.

For toilettes de ville, little garments tight to the figure are in vogue. They are made of velvet or cashmere. The velvet dresses are trimmed with silk fringe; the dark cashmere may be trimmed with black silk or narrow velvet.

The new woollen laces, very open, like the ancient "grosse Anglaterre," generally styled Spanish lace, are now much admired; they are worn on velvet cloaks. This lace will be properly adapted for shawls and scarfs, because it is both light and strong. It comes nearly the same as the imitation black lace, and it does not lose its stiffness

In the accompanying Illustrations we have a rich black velvet robe, trimmed with black lace; the head-dress, black lace and flower of volubilis

In the accompanying costume, the robe is of white taffetas d'Italie, with two rows ornamented with ruche à la russie in white satin. Head-dress, vine and grapes, the leaves of autumnal tint.

In the adjoining column is a portrait sketch to show the head-dress of Madame la Princesse Demidoff, at the last given by M. le Comte Pridet de la Seine, at the Hôtel de Ville. This lady is the daughter of Jerome Bonaparte, and cousin-german to Louis Napoleon, President of the Republic. About ten years since, she was married to the Prince Demidoff, a member of one of the richest families in Russia. The splendour of the head-dress worn by the Princess on the above occasion was very extraordinary: it consisted entirely of diamonds, upwards of a million francs' value.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

As the season advances, its various pursuits begin to be developed—in country, the rich beauties of nature; in town, the rare contrivances of art. Among the novelties in the latter already announced is one of a very sterling character. Of so peculiar a kind, indeed, is it, that a case has been submitted to one of the learned sergeants-at-law to say whether it be consistent with the crown and dignity of our Sovereign Lady the Queen. His opinion has been given—that, "so far as he can understand its objects," he has no objection to pronouncing it legal. This mystery, which Mr. Sergeant Wilkins only professes to comprehend "so far," is "a National Race Club and Sporting Assurance," wherein a branch may be opened by every licensed victualler in his own house for his own connexion. Its objects are "avowedly to excite public interest in the sport of racing, and the promotion of what is termed sporting art, by the publication of portraits of British race-horses." What are the Medici to Florence and Louis Quatorze to times past, in comparison with the re-publicans of London (for so shall they be when they are themselves again) to the year 1849? With temples to the arts in every street, lane, court, and alley of the metropolis, we may look for the Muses among the arrivals at Mivart's: with Sporting Athenæums in thousands, it cannot be long before Kennington-common possesses a rival for the Elgin Hippodrome. . . . "They fool me to the top of my bent!"

With the next week will commence the true business of the market in odds, because the acceptances for the great betting handicaps will then have been sufficiently canvassed, and profit will no longer be dealing with an unreal mockery. On the 7th and 8th—Wednesday and Friday—the Liverpool Chase is none off at Cheltenham. The 9th was the day for declaring acceptances for the "Open Handicap," the "Free Handicap," and the "Free Hurdle Race"—the fourth stake does not close till Thursday. With open weather, there can be little doubt of a first-rate meeting. Places like Cheltenham, the resorts of pleasure-seekers and pleasure-payers, are peculiarly situated to give éclat to such sports as still retain their recreative characteristics. You reach them with comfort, and you find comfort waiting to welcome your arrival

The first week in February is especially rich in attractions for the patrons of the leash. On Monday the Ashdown Coursing Meeting at Lambourn, Berks, commences; as also does the Workington Spring and the Newmarket—the latter extending over three days. Driffield Meeting will take place on the 6th and 7th; Baldock on the 7th and 8th; Newcastle on the 8th; Alcester on the 8th and 9th, and Raynham on the 8th and 10th. The Alcar meeting above must not be confounded with the great tryst of that ilk at Waterloo, near Liverpool, which occurs on the 21th inst. and the 1st of March.

Coursing and yachting are foremost among the sports that are new borne on the flood of popular favour. They contrive to win golden opinions without the least tinsture of old "philanthropic schemes—it might be as well were the turf also to adopt as it motto—

The spirit, independents, let me share.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—There was some lively betting this afternoon on the Metropolitan Handicap, Long-gaze and Backbiter being all the rage; Cameron was quoted "a shade better," and Lanercost seemed a favourite; Sir Joseph Paxton in the Chester Cup betting, but a decided improvement in the Flying Dutchman, Nunnykirk, and Eskhiron for the Derby.

Blackheath, Thursday, Feb. 1, 1849.

Emigration.—On Monday there were 550 emigrants in the depôt at Plymouth waiting for the arrival of the following ships the Amagerness, Shannah, Agenoria, and British Empire. The Agincura quite full with Plymouth, and prepared to receive them under the enlargement of the establishment, so as to accommodate 1200 persons. The Pemberton, Captain Richardson, sailed on Monday with 355 Irish females for Port Philip, under the care of Dr. Sullivan, a gentleman well known in the London department; and the William Hyde on the same day, for Port Adelaide and Port Phillip. The Stebenheath was preparing to sail for Port Phillip, with 300 emigrants on board. The next ship to sail is the Inconstant, Captain Gelliman, with 206 emigrants for Port Phillip. Mr. Parker, the late Poor-Law Commissioner, whose name was recently mentioned in connexion with the Andover Union, embarked in the William Hyde for Port Phillip.

St. Margaret's Burying-ground again.—Perhaps there is greater danger in opening the ground here for interment than in any other churchyard in or near the metropolis. The soil is a loose sand, like the sand of an hourglass: it does not adhere when it remains, but they in a dreadful compound, engendering malaria of direful effect. After rains, in hot weather, the evaporation is charged with effluvia as intolerable as a death-chamber; and to what the closure is entirely fatal, with swollen cloth, and when the doors and windows are open, of necessity gets charged with this deleterious vapour. No time should be lost in covering over this pestiferous ground. It is a plague-spot, the most visible blots in the empire, during the sitting of Parliament, are exposed to; besides, it is surrounded by a large population, and overlooked by a hospital for the sick and maimed.—The Builder

Cholera in the Holborn Union.—Several fatal cases of cholera having occurred in this union, additional medical officers have been appointed to attend the paupers on the first approach of the premonitory symptoms of the disease. On Sunday morning, the Earl of Carlisle, Dr. Southwood Smith, Mr. Grainger, and Dr. Farre, attended at the workhouse, in Gray's-inn-lane, to decide upon the proper steps to be taken to stay the spread of the malady. They expressed a very decided opinion that not more than 800 inmates should be permitted in the building at any one time. Various suggestions made by the medical officers were ordered to be carried into effect.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English funds have fluctuated considerably during the week, agitated by the menacing aspect of affairs in Paris. On Monday Consols opened at 91½, but on the arrival of the Paris news prices receded to 90¾, afterwards closing at 90¾. This gave rise to considerable speculation, and Long Annuities to 90¾; but, as the apprehensions of a crisis in Paris grew less, prices gradually advanced to 91¼. This temporary depression was succeeded by much animation on Wednesday, when there was a majority in favour of the proposition of the assembly being received. Prices advanced to 91¾; but a large sale towards the close of the day again caused a decline to 91¾. On Thursday considerable business was done. Consols advancing to 91¾ 92 for the Account; but on the issue of the Queen's speech being known, several heavy sales again flustered the market, and 91¾ ⅜ became the quotation. Exchequer Bills have been very steady, and, although 2½ pm. and Inf. Bonds have advanced about five shillings. The heavy stocks have now at last lined their relative value. Some flatness prevailed in the market at the close of the week, as the following will show:—Reduced, 92 91¾ ⅞; Three per Cent. Consols, Annuities, 92 91¾; New Three per Cents, 1855, 92 91¾; Long Annuities, Expire Jan. 5, 1860, 9 8 15-16; Three per Cents, Expire Jan. 5, 1860, 8⅞; Three per Cents, Expire Jan. 5, 1860, 8⅞; Ditto, under £1000, 8⅞; South Sea Stock, 101; Ditto for Account, 92 91¾; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 2½d., March, 43 40 pm.; Ditto, £500, 47 pm.; £500, 2½d., March, 41 pm. 2d., June, 47 43 pm.; Small, 2½d., March, 41 43 pm.—2d., June, 50 pm.

The Foreign Market has been animated; and the settling on Wednesday, although tolerably easy, was heavier than has been known for some time past. Mexican, Portuguese, and Spanish continue to be the principal speculative stocks. Mexican, on Monday, quoted 20¾, gradually receding to 20½; improving on Tuesday, however, to 20⅝, again advancing to 20⅝ ⅞ after the close of the account. Portuguese improved from 27 to 27⅛ on Tuesday; but, on the following day, in consequence of the part payment of the dividend, receded to 27. Spanish Five per Cents have been flat at 14, after quoting 14⅛; the Three per Cents remaining nearly stationary. Prices, when the week closed, were Belgian, 1834, 2½ Buenos Ayres, 6—Chilian, 6—Columbian, 5—Danish, 3—Dutch 2½ per Cent. Certificates, 58; Ditto, 4 per Cents, 74; Spanish Bonds, Account, 15⅛; Ditto, Passive Bonds, 3¼; Spanish Bonds, 3 per Cent., 28; Belgian 2½ per Cent., 45; Dutch 2½ per Cent., 49¼; Ditto, 4 per Cent. Certificates, 78¼; Ditto, 5 per Cent., 102; Ditto, 6 per Cent., 74.

The settling in the Share Market disclosed a system of bearing that has received rather extensively upon its authors. Many of the railways have been bought to procure, that when delivery was called for, London and North-Western was purchased at 143; Great Western at 103; South-Western at 44¾; and Midland at 99. The market at the close of the week was much unsettled, the advance in the month's prices bearing a treble proportion to that of Consols. At closing, rates were for Caledonian, 20¾; Great Western, 103½; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 22½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 79½; Ditto, Fifths, 8; London and Brighton, 10½; London and North-Western, 136; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, 2; Midland, 97½; Ditto, £50 Shares, 21; Midland, Birmingham, and Derby, 70; North British, 7½; North Eastern, Berwick, 11½; North Eastern, York, Scrip, No. 4, 8; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, Extension No. 1 (Y. and N.), 22; Ditto, Ditto, No. 2 (New and B.), 2½.

SCENE AT THE MOUTH OF THE PIT, AFTER THE EXPLOSION.

sufferers was drawn up, Mr. Ayre, Mr. Wainwright, and other surgeons from Barnsley, were on the spot, and were indefatigable in their exertions. The state of the mine, however, was such that the bodies of those who were at any distance from the bottom of the shaft could not be reached, without endangering the lives of the men who descended. But this did not prevent the endeavour being made to rescue them; and several of those engaged in the attempt were overcome by the "choke damp," and were carried back insensible, and in that state drawn out of the pit. As soon as ever they recovered they resumed their praiseworthy efforts, and by about five o'clock sixteen of the sufferers had been extricated alive, and five dead. Amongst the most active in his efforts was a young man named Beaumont, in the employ of Messrs. Field, Cooper, and Co.

The work of recovering the bodies was continued without ceasing throughout Wednesday night. By eight o'clock on Thursday morning there had been recovered 58 dead and 27 alive. Of the latter, however, three died shortly after being rescued from the pit. Up to Thursday evening, when the last of the bodies was recovered, there were 74 dead, and 24 alive, making a total of 98, the whole of those who were missing. Of the 24 men who were then alive, all were burnt or injured, two or three of them so seriously that their lives were despaired of. One of them died during Thursday night, making the number of the killed 75. There were also in the pit eight horses, six of which were killed by the explosion.

On Friday, the Coroner of the district, Mr. Thomas Badger, opened the inquest upon the bodies of the sufferers at the Masons' Arms, Worsbro'-dale, before a highly respectable jury composed of 16 residents of the vicinity.

In consequence of the arrangements not being complete for conveying the jury to the places were the bodies were lying, two witnesses (William Broadhead, an engine tender, and James Armitage, a collier) were first examined.

The jury proceeded in an omnibus to the places were the deceased lay. So numerous and widely extended were they, that the surgeon, Mr. Ayr, stated that in his opinion this preliminary duty would occupy the whole of the day, and the greater part of next day (Saturday).

At the adjourned inquest on Saturday, it appeared, from the evidence of several of the survivors, that the ventilation of the pit has long notoriously been in a very bad state, the coal having been got very irregularly, and large holes left, in which accumulations of foul air were inevitable, no current ever reaching them. Other of the witnesses did not think any one was to blame. The inquest was then adjourned to Thursday week.

On Saturday afternoon, the greater part of the unfortunate sufferers were interred in five large graves in the churchyard at Worsbro'.

The wives and children of such of the deceased as were married are very numerous, and the whole district is filled with mourners. A subscription is about to be commenced for the bereaved, who, by this catastrophe, have, almost without exception, been plunged into the depths of destitution.

IMPROVED SAFETY-LAMP.

(To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.)

The frequent occurrence of calamitous accidents in coal-mines, and the recent disastrous and heart-rending explosion at Worsboro' Dale, induces me to solicit the favour of your inserting the accompanying Diagram of a Safety-Lamp, which I hope may be as safe and convenient in practice as it is in theory.

When we consider that the Safety-Lamps have now been in use for so many years, causing security in all cases where proper care is employed, although they may not be absolutely safe under unusual circumstances, their utility appears sufficiently sanctioned by experience to make them the subject of Legislative enactment. The evils complained of in the modifications of the Davy Lamp, are, that while they add to the security, they diminish so much the amount of light, as to render them practically useless.

Electricity has at various times, during the last ten years, been proposed as a means of lighting collieries; the electricity streaming between two charcoal points affords a light of much beauty, and is perfectly safe if completely surrounded by glass, but capable of igniting an explosive mixture, if exposed; but for the general working in the various ramifications of a coal mine, this light is not sufficiently portable, and is, besides, exceedingly inconvenient, uncertain, and costly.

From what has been stated, it appears, then, of the highest importance that a lamp should combine with the most certain safety and portability the quality of giving a good light for a certain number of hours without any exposure of the flame for the purpose of trimming, &c. A careful perusal of the following description and explanation of my invention will, I hope, prove that these qualities have been carefully studied, and exist in a much greater degree than in any Safety-Lamps employed to the present time.

I may preface the explanation by remarking that my first and chief object was to construct a lamp in such a way that no direct contact should exist between the flame and the surrounding air. I proposed, in the first instance, to feed the flame by passing the air through water by means of a clock-work arrangement; but this I found would be complicated and inconvenient. It then occurred to me that the air might be passed through small capillary copper tubes—the tubes passing through the lamp, are constantly surrounded with the cold oil; this is, indeed, the main feature in my lamp. The next point is the arrangement by which the wick may be lowered, or raised, or trimmed with facility, and without exposing the flame. A is the body of the lamp, constructed of tin, copper, or any other metal. Through the body of the lamp pass a number of capillary copper tubes, such as are used in the construction of Leslie's gas-burners. These tubes are soldered or brazed to the top and bottom, as shown at B B. The air, before it can get to the flame, must pass through the tubes. At the lower part of the lamp, and beneath the bottom, a number of diaphragms of wire gauze are soldered. This is for additional safety, the air having to pass through them before it can pass through the tubes. Thus we have the combined protection of the small tubes surrounded by a cold liquid and the wire gauze. On the top of the lamp is soldered another plate, D, to which is attached the lamp glass. This plate, it will be seen, is slightly conical, and serves to direct the current of air on to the flame. The ascending current then passes up the chimney of the glass, the upper part of which only is covered and protected with wire gauze; the glass next the flame, unlike the Davy Lamp, offers no impediment whatever to the passage of the light. The glass, for additional safety, might be made in such a way as to contain water, so that in the case of the glass being broken at any time the water would immediately extinguish the flame. E is the trimmer, and consists of a piece of wire passing through the lamp, the extremity being bent at right angles. F and G are two small pressure rollers, by means of which the wick may be raised or depressed. The wick passes out of the lamp through a small tube, and is wound on to the reel I. This reel can at any time be replenished, and the new wick stitched to the end of that in use. Now we will suppose this lamp is lighted and in contact with fire damp: what would result? The explosive air, if it ignited, would continue to burn on the upper part of the capillary tubes so long as the current was allowed to pass through the body of the lamp; anything checking the current would cause it to descend a short distance into the cold tubes, when it would be extinguished. The next consideration is the proper management of these lamps. I would suggest that every mine should have a department expressly for this purpose; and that each man, on going to his work in the morning, should have his lamp supplied to him ready trimmed; and that he should, on no consideration, be allowed to interfere with the lamp, excepting for the purpose of trimming; and that in the case of any derangement by accident, or any other cause, the lamp should be immediately conveyed to the manager.

I have endeavoured to explain the theory of my lamp with as much clearness as possible. Should any of your mechanical or scientific readers think my suggestion worthy of practical experiment, and require any further explanation, I shall be most happy to give it.

I have intruded greatly on your very valuable space, but I trust the importance of the subject will be a sufficient apology.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 357.—Vol. XIV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1849. [Sixpence.

IRELAND, AND ITS MINISTERIAL TREATMENT.

Although the session is but a week old, our legislators are in full debate upon the miseries of Ireland. Two measures of the Government have been proposed—the one of continued coercion, the other of temporary relief. The first has been already sanctioned in the Commons by a majority so great as almost to amount to unanimity. The second will, in all probability, meet with greater opposition.

The sentiment both of Parliament and the country is in favour of the Irish administration of the Earl of Clarendon. The Government will, therefore, have no difficulty in obtaining the continuation for six months longer of the extraordinary powers which were entrusted to him last session for the more effectual suppression of the rebellion or insurrection of Messrs. O'Brien and Meagher. If that rebellion were serio-comic in its results, there was no comedy in its intention. Its comparative harmlessness was the work of Lord Clarendon, who, by the judicious use of the powers in his hands, prevented it from becoming formidable.

While insurrection in Austria, Prussia, and France was not suppressed without an enormous cost of human life, the suppression of the insurrection in Ireland was almost bloodless. There was no assault upon a populous city, no combat between the troops and the people in crowded thoroughfares, no destruction of property. The field of battle was a cabbage garden; and the only Irish barricade ever heard of, except in the fiery columns of the United Irishman, was erected in an attic. To the Irish Executive the credit of this result is entirely due. Lord Clarendon used his powers with firmness, but with forbearance; with sufficient vigour, but with the greatest discretion. He saved the Irish from much misery; and many a fierce enemy of the Saxon has to thank his timely severity for existence and safety. When the Government in his name asks for the continuance of those powers for a short and specified time, the country is disposed to give entire credence to the assertion that the demand is not made in wantonness of tyranny, but for justice and mercy—not for the purposes of oppression, as some of the Repeal faction represent it to be, but in consequence of a necessity of which the Irish Executive is the best if not the only judge. In this spirit the House of Commons viewed the application for the continued suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. In this spirit they sanctioned the principle; and in this spirit the British public generally will, if the renewal be granted, rely upon Lord Clarendon to use and not to abuse it.

But coercion, unfortunately, is the easiest part of the business. It is no remedy for the social cancer of a corroding pauperism. It cannot cure the destitution of millions. The turbulence of portions of Ireland may be restrained by the suspension of the rights of free citizenship enjoyed in England and Scotland; but Irish hunger, bankruptcy, degradation, and despair are not diminishable by the compulsory quietude of the people. Other measures must be simultaneously adopted to procure them food or employment. The paramount difficulty is to decide what those measures shall be. The Government is fully aware of its duty in this respect; but neither Government nor society know very well what course to pursue, and what remedies to adopt that shall be immediately beneficial. There is no lack of good will. The same hand which coerced the disaffected lavished eight millions of pounds sterling upon the perishing. There is, perhaps, a lack of knowledge. There is, certainly, a lack of power even to commence, without doing additional mischief, a task so gigantic as the social regeneration of a people squeezed down into pauperism by the neglect and mismanagement of centuries. All the accounts received from Ireland are painfully unanimous upon the social revolution that famine and a panic-terror are working among the people. Mr. John O'Connell drew a striking picture of the present state of his country, in his speech on Tuesday night, in reply to Sir George Grey. "We are," said he, "a perishing people; the strength of our population is gone; multitudes have emigrated, and those who remain are rendered powerless by their own internal dissensions, and are split almost into as many parties and factions as there are individuals. I do not believe that if he who once possessed a power over the hearts of the people of Ireland such as no man ever before wielded, were again amongst them, he would be able to rouse them to one single effort against any outrage or injustice that may be inflicted on them; so utterly hopeless are they, so dread is their despair."

Mr. O'Connell might have bestowed some further colouring on this rapid sketch. He might have depicted the millions of helpless and hopeless paupers who swarm in every corner of the land. He might have told of the millions of acres that have never been cultivated, although capable of cultivation, and of the hundreds of thousands of fertile acres that have been abandoned by their occupiers and thrown upon the hands of their ruined landlords. He might have dwelt upon the misery of one portion of the people, without forgetting the scandalous dishonesty of another. He might have told us of the hundreds of [farmers who have defrauded their landlords, and fled with their hoarded gold to America—not so much because they were dishonest, but because they feared that ruin would overtake them if they remained, and that rent and poor-rates together would reduce them into a pauperism as utterly hopeless as that of their neighbours. He might have shown us the insolvent and helpless landlords, as well as the destitute people; and in noticing the vast amount of recent emigration, he might have observed that it was principally the youthful, the vigorous, and the enterprising portion of the population that shook from off their feet the dust of their native land; and that the old, the diseased, the suffering, the helpless, and the dispirited remained behind, as dead-weights upon the luckless proprietors of an unproducing, though not unproductive soil. These facts are now notorious; and it seems that the Poor-Law—so just in theory, so desirable in principle, and so well intended, has but aggravated all these evils and extended the misery, if not the demoralization, of Ireland to the middle and the higher classes.

"The present law," says a recent letter, bearing the well-known signature of Aubrey de Vere, a resident landlord, "aggravates every old evil and vice, implants new and worse, and blights or empoisons the influences of nascent good among us. Evictions were denounced. Evictions are now precipitated, because the only alternative consists in leaving to men supported by the rate that land which they cannot cultivate, and by the produce of which alone the rate can be paid. Estates overburthened with debt were complained of. At present estates in the market can find no purchaser, and those most heavily encumbered are least likely to be pushed to a sale, because their sale would be least likely to recompense the mortgagee and the attorney. Our bad agriculture was an opprobrium. The Poor-Law swallows up the means of its improvement, and the English or Scotch farmer politely refuses our invitation. Absenteeism was our chief curse. Absentees by necessity are now added to absentees by choice. Our emigration was formerly insufficient; it is now changed into an emigration of capital. Day by day our farmers fly in panic-stricken hordes, leaving the land a waste."

This is a more striking, more eloquent, and more complete picture than that of Mr. O'Connell. The Poor-Law has not wrought out the deliverance of Ireland. It was to expect too much of it to believe that it would do so in one generation, even if it did not crush the landlords under the heavy wheels of its chariot. It is evident that the details of that measure must be scrupulously and thoroughly reconsidered and reformed; and we are glad to see that Ministers, by proposing a committee to inquire into the working of the act, are of this opinion. The true object of a Poor-Law is to diminish pauperism, and to transform the unproductive pauper into a productive labourer. But a Poor-Law that is oppressive upon the owner of the soil falls in this object. It makes a pauper of him also, and diminishes the sphere of productive employment by confiscating capital. This is the fundamental error of the present Irish Poor-Law. It has been introduced into a country unable to bear it. A Poor-Law affirming the right of the able-bodied is a powerful medicine. It may cure a strong patient, but it may kill a weak one. England bears it, and has striven under it; but England has been inured to its operation for two centuries, and it was introduced before the population pressed very severely upon the resources of property. Were it introduced now for the first time into England, and were England as Ireland is, a purely agricultural country, the landlords could not exist under it. The reconsideration of this law is all the practical details of its working evidently the first task that Parliament must perform; and it is to be hoped that the committee to be appointed on the motion of Sir William Somerville will be prompt in its action. It is not enough to grant from the taxes paid by the British people large sums in aid of such Irish Poor-Law Unions as are unable to bear the burden of the necessary poor-rate, as proposed by the Government on Wednesday last. England has enough to do to maintain her own poor. The burden must be adjusted to the back that is to bear it; and it must be accompanied by other measures which will lighten its load, such as cultivation of the waste lands by a peasant proprietary, or by a tenantry having leases in perpetuity. It will not do, as Sir Aubrey de Vere says, "to make believe that we can multiply resources by shifting halfpence from pocket to pocket, or that we can lengthen the pauper's blanket by sewing on at one end what we have cut off at the other." The evil to be remedied is poverty. Poverty can only be permanently and satisfactorily remedied by labour. The only labour that can be applied in Ireland is labour upon the soil. Ireland has partially or wholly lost her food for three consecutive years. She suffers from that loss, and from the drain of her best blood, consequent upon the pame which it has occasioned. A mere Poor-Law will not create wealth, except there be a proprietary solvent enough and sensible enough to employ the people productively rather than feed them idly. A Poor-Law that is too stringent and oppressive upon the rate-payer, defeats its own intention in this respect. The Irish Poor-Law has done this; and the proprietors of the soil are in a condition that they can neither employ the people productively nor maintain them idly. It must be reformed, there fore, before the evil becomes too great, and before all classes are swamped in one abyss of inextricable misery. Such misery would not confine itself to Ireland. England and Ireland are like the Siamese twins. The gangrene of the one extend to the other; and the social pestilence that attacks the life of Ireland must of necessity make some inroad upon that of England. Though we have a large burden in the million and a half of English paupers that we have to maintain, it would be cheaper for us to aid the Irish landlords in cultivating Ireland than to allow their estates to be confiscated for the present necessities of our enormous population. Three years of such pauperism would eat up all the property of the country; and what would be the condition of England if such were the condition of Ireland?

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

We understand that the command of the forces in India is to be offered to Sir George Napier, who is now at Nice.

The First Lord of the Admiralty has given public notice to officers desirous of interview, that he will not be able to see any one until the commencement of the levees for the season, which begin next week.

The Captains' Good Service Pension, vacated by the promotion of Rear-Admiral W. F. Carroll, C.B., has been bestowed upon Commodore Sir J. Gordon Brenton, K.C.B., K.C.H., late superintendent of Woolwich Dockyard. He is only eight in sen ority from the top of the list.

Reduction of the Navy.—Mr. A. Anderson, M.P. for Southampton, intends proposing to Parliament, "That a Select Committee of the House be appointed to inquire into the practicability of effecting a large reduction of naval expenditure by providing an available steam fleet through the means of private enterprise," and with that intent has addressed a letter to Mr. W. C. Morgan, secretary to the Steam-ship Owners' Association, 22, [illegible] January, explaining the mode by which he proposes to obtain his object. Mr. Morgan has transmitted copies of Mr. Anderson's letter to the owners of most steam-packets. The proposal is for owners to obtain consent of the Admiralty, and then to strengthen their vessels and adapt them for warlike purposes, giving the Government the power of purchase or hire, at prices to be fixed by arbitration. The ships, after the alterations are approved by a competent surveyor, are to be exempt from light dues and compulsory pilotage. The cost of alteration for a ship of 600 tons is estimated at from £130 to £200. Mr. Anderson anticipates by the adoption of his proposition that an unrivalled fleet would be ready at all times, without burden on the national exchequer. In time of war the same crews are to remain with war wages, but additional officers and men to be taken from the Royal Navy. He states that the Ordnance are ready to furnish the armament, and that the Marine Artillery could work the guns. With such an available force, Mr. Anderson considers further outlay for the construction of steam ships of war unnecessary, and that many now in ordinary can could be placed in ordinary, and thus an important reduction of public expenditure be effected.

Woolwich, Feb. 4.—The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have ordered a new frigate to be laid down at this yard, from plans furnished by Messrs. Read, Chatfield, and Creuze, of the late Naval School of Arg[illegible]. She is said to be named the Sea Foreno, and is to be pierced for 50 guns. [illegible] expected her keel will shortly be laid down on No. 4 s[illegible]. The Esmeralda, 16, and Vanduin, 50, building at this yard, are progressing rapidly in consequence of the additional number of workmen that have lately been placed upon them.—Torch, steam-vessel, is nearly ready for commission, and will be tried down the river in a few days.—Captain F. Bullock assumes the command of the Dockyard during the absence of Commodore H. Eden, who is at present on a visit to Armagh, preparatory to his approaching nuptials with the Hon. Miss Beresford.

The funeral of Lieutenant-General Sir T. Arbuthnot took place with great military pomp and ceremony, at St. Philip's church, Salford, on Saturday. The 30th Foot, the 4th Dragoons, and the Royal Artillery at present in barracks at Manchester assisted in the ceremony; and the mayor and four aldermen of the Liverpool corporation, and the mayors, aldermen, and councillors of Manchester and Salford, were present, and joined in the procession.

The Military War Medals.—The war medals for the veterans of the army were delivered at the Horse-Guards, from the Mint, on Monday last, and are now being sorted, preparatory to immediate distribution.

Cavalry for India.—With reference to the report circulated last week amongst several of our contemporaries, that the 8th Hussars and 12th Lancers had received orders for embarcation for India, we can state that no such orders have been issued. The 8th Hussars and 17th Lancers are the first light cavalry regiments for foreign service.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PRESENT STATE OF PARIS.

Paris, February 7th, 1849.

New [illegible] M de Salvandy so often since applied to the circumstan[illegible] during the past week—"On danse sur un volcan." [illegible] Socialists, for the French still show themselves chary of the pleasures that they offer to others; Paris rests at the Opera masked balls as of yore and all this upon the very crater of a volcano, which gives one a whiff of sulphureous smoke on Monday week last, and was hastily plugged up for the time being by a mass of cannon and bayonets. Paris still dances, but the volcano is not extinct, although it is choked, its mutterings and rumblings may be heard in the violent ultra-Republican red journals, and in the distracted and spiteful murmurings of the disappointed Montagne in the Assembly. Those who might by chance have quitted Paris during the fearful days of June, and returned only on that day which has taken its place in the history of the Republic as the 29th day of January, would have found their old revolutionary Paris almost in the same state in which they left it. Barricades, it is true, filled all the principal thoroughfares of the capital; cannon protected the building of the Assembly, and there it still remains; the gardens of the Tuileries were closed, and showed, through the palisades, groups of soldiers with stacked arms among the leafless trees; the Champs Elysées were once more a bivouac and a camp; and before the advancing battalions, as they marched along the streets of the capital, retreated some hundreds of those nameless and incomprehensible beings whose dwellings are a mystery, whose existence is a problem, who only appear upon the surface of society when the wind of insurrection is blowing, as if they had sprung out of the earth, and who disappear as they have come; they retired grumbling into the faubourgs. The puff of the volcano was a thick one, and the smoke still hovers over the crater of the city. The surface is calm enough, and has remained so during the week; but the military preparation lurks in the background still: all the débouchées of the different railroads are still filled with baggage-waggons, and the diligences containing the passengers, rooms and halls of each establishment. The front court of the ex-Palais Royal is closed and filled with soldiers, who cook their meals al fresco in the old abode of Royalty; the troops are numerous, and the gunners at their barracks; the sabre of office is sticky guarded; the patrols are numerous and incessant during the night; the military spirit of General Changarnier still pervades the capital. The Ultra journals may threaten and call it what they will, the Mobile guards may bluster and accuse as they will in the Assembly; but no one can be the dupe of their manœuvres. All Paris and all France are well aware that a well-spread and deeply-laid conspiracy, which had its affiliations throughout various parts of the country, had fixed upon the 29th of January as the day for a fresh insurrection, which was to be attempted at the same time in the great cities, and that the military precautionary measures alone prevented its outbreak. Although the whole plot has failed, and the insurrection has avorté, the post of the 29th January has gained itself a name as memorable as the more successful ones of the 15th of May or the 23rd of June, which were allowed to come to a crisis. The arrests of suspected conspirators are said to have already amounted to some 200; and although Colonel Forestier of the National Guard may have been released after some examination and explanation, there are enough of the supposed ringleaders in prison to lead to further discoveries of the designs of the secret societies in all their ramifications; and papers enough have been seized to prove what Paris and all France had to expect from the tender mercies of the "Red" ultra-Democrats and Socialists, had they seized upon the reins of Government by a coup de main—the old sanguinary extravagancies—the old frantic imitation of past days of terror a comité de salut public the dissolution of the National Guard—a spoliation of all who "possess"—a confiscation of all [illegible] an "guillotine" of suspected aristocrats by the regne of the guillotine. Among the arrests, that of D'Alton Shee, ex-Legitimist, ex-pair de France, and of the fashionable world, and now a Socialist chief, and president of the ultra-revolutionary club of the "Solidarité Républicaine," has excited a great sensation among his quondam friends of the upper classes; but pity is not one of the feelings excited. The arrest of some of the former delegates of the Luxembourg Commission under the government of Messrs. Louis Blanc and Albert, sufficiently shows the cankerous nature of the doctrines the former rulers of the country preached.

The position of the lower classes, in general, in the midst of this hardly-hurly of the last week, has been quite passive and full of proper feeling among the mass: the working classes in general, and in their great majority, are feelingly, and only too miserably, alive to the truths taught them by all the disasters of the past year, that revolutions upon revolutions only plunge them into deeper and deeper distress. The feeling of the bourgeoisie—that is to say, of the shop-keeping classes—grows meanwhile, and at every new crisis of this kind, more and more strenuously reactionary; and as they are conscious that their opinions cannot be blamed for their clamour; this feeling is now openly expressed in only one invariable tendency. It is impossible to enter any shop and speak upon the political position of the country without hearing the de facto Constantinople expressed for the restoration of Henri V. Of Louis Philip, of the Orleans party, of a Regency, there is never any mention, a Monarchy, and the Monarch the one alluded to, is all their cry. Changarnier as a dictator seems go so far as to look upon a restoration as an eventual certainty, and make it only a question of time. Their words are not "Aurons-nous Henri V?" but "Quand l'aurons-nous?"

Meanwhile the Legitimist party, as a party, still keeps its old determination not to stir, not to intrigue, but to bide its time. Rumours have been afloat and about to the dissolution spread abroad among the Garde Mobile, in consequence of their turbulent conduct on the 28th. That no very great reliance is to be placed upon these young jackanapes of the republic, as a party, is evident, and as they remain the Force, is very possible: spite of their deeds in June, their vacillating spirit, and their hot silly heads, easily led away, are no qualifications for steady defenders de la patrie. It seems that the general feeling of the Mobile is that the cause of order has been greatly exaggerated; and the changes in their organization, and among their superior officers, have greatly tended to give them a more reassuring character.

The army is said to be steady to the Government, but very willing to shout unanimously "Vive l'Empereur!" if the cry should be once raised. Altogether the events of the past week, and the ready preparation of the Government, may be said to have consolidated rather than weakened the Republic, in spite of the clamours of the ultras; for that crisis, which all expected with terror, but from which the party adverse to the Republic—i. e. the majority of the country—looked as likely to bring an immediate change should the ultras be subdued, has certainly been averted for a time by the vigorous measures taken. Upon this subject the opinions are as various as men's tempers in these times: the expectations of the sanguine, the hopes of the [illegible] the apprehensive, the terrors of the timorous, are all there [illegible] and these are times when no [illegible] The design of the ultra party [illegible] Assembly, and the election of [illegible] wise than produce such a powerful [illegible] has been proved; they are weak, and alarm [illegible] and impatient; but it does not appear probable, under the present aspect of affairs, that they can make a fresh attempt; although with their eternal mistaken momentum, that if they can get up the people must be on their side, all things are possible. The "confusion twice confounded" of the Assembly has, meanwhile, added greatly to the ferment of the week. There, the Montagnards, or "Highlanders" as they have been nicknamed, hail them with storm and fret more furiously than ever. Ledru-Rollin lifts his nose aloft more imperiously than before. Felix Pyat flashes lightning from his large eyes, and Proudhon translates and reviews in Bully Dodsley [illegible] active part. They act the Convention over again, and deem themselves its modern heroes; they employ their usual tactics in meeting beforehand accusations by recriminations, and "la manœuvre" by "la contre manœuvre." They denounce Changarnier as a traître à la patrie, for his preventive preparations, which they call a provocation; they demand enquêtes par lamentations; they insist upon the immediate convocation of the High Court of Justice, and accuse posed that, in consequence, no further executions should take place, especially as it was to be hoped that a general amnesty would shortly be accorded. The matter was ordered to be taken into consideration on a future day. Several paragraphs of the bill on fundamental rights were adopted.

PORTUGAL.

Our advices this week from Lisbon state that, on the 30th ult., the debates in the Cortes had terminated; but the charges of incapacity and neglect brought against the Minister of Finance, had induced him to resign, an example that had been followed by some of his colleagues. The new Ministry is as follows:—Marshal Saldanha, President of the Council; Conde de Tojeira, Minister of Foreign Affairs and Marine, ad interim; Senhor Lopez, Minister of Finance; Baron d'Oleram, Minister of War; Sa da Vergas, Justice.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts eleven days later than our last week's intelligence have reached us from New York, up to the 23rd ult.

There was no further increase in the returns of cholera throughout the States. The mania with regard to California, although not having had its maximum, has not diminished in intensity, and the excitement throughout the Union is reported to be very great. It seems, by the statement now put forward, that the extent of the scene of operation covers nearly the whole country, and that, whilst formerly the pieces of gold found were limited to two ounces in weight, they are now being found in lumps of two pounds, daily. Emigrants and vessels are heard of throughout all the southern and eastern ports of the state. There is nothing more of importance; and in the hubbub about California, the cholera seems to have almost made its exit.

In Congress, the Slavery Question and the admission of California as a state had been debated, but without any result.

The Southern Convention had adopted Mr. Calhoun's manifesto. That gentleman was very unwell.

The articles of agreement for the construction of a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama have been signed. The contracting parties are Messrs. Aspinwall, Stephens, and Channay, constituting the Panama Railroad Company; to whom a grant of 250,000 dollars a year for 20 years had been recommended. It is proposed to complete the railroad in three years.

MEXICO.

Recent accounts represent the state of Mexico as one of turbulence and insubordination, which the Government was too weak to check. The papers are filled with accounts of robberies and murders committed in the very heart of the capital. Counterfeit gold and silver coin was in circulation. To add to these lamentable accounts, we have details of atrocities committed by the Indians. Congress was in session. It was feared that a quorum would not be obtained by the 1st of January. The Chamber of Deputies had framed several stringent decrees respecting absentees.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

By the monthly West India mail-packet Tay, we have this week advices to the 26th of December from this quarter. At Chagres, a great many arrivals were expected from ports of emigrants and gold searchers to California. A steamer had arrived with 250 passengers already, amongst whom were the Governor and Judges and other authorities for this new portion of the American Union. Chagres is merely a fishing village, containing about 200 houses, all storied houses, built of wood or bamboos, and thatched, and with scarcely sufficient provisions of the commonest kinds, such as dried fish and vegetables, with a few eggs and fowls, and a little meat. Bread is the scarcest article; nearly a great many of the poorer adventurers were very badly off for food and lodging for the short time of two days they had been kept there when the Tay left Chagres, and the boatmen having received sums five or six times above the usual prices from the Governor and Judges, and all parties able to give it, in their hurry to leave this wretched place, the consequence is cannot be procured for some time, at least at fair rates, by the poorer majority; and it is therefore to be feared that exposure to the sun, wretched living, and the fatigue up the river and across to Panama from Cruces, which must be done on mules, in the rainy all two days, with canoes and riding, would render them more liable to the bad effects of the climate, and produce great mortality amongst them.

CANADA.

The session of the Canadian Legislature commenced on the 18th ult. The Governor [illegible] the Speech from the Throne, in which he congratulated the Legislature on the [illegible] during the past year, and referred to the unfortunate occurrences of 1837 and 1838. The restrictions imposed on the use of the French language were removed by an act of the Imperial Parliament; and assurance was given that steps would be taken for conferring upon the provincial authorities the entire control and management of the post office department; and a hope was expressed of the practicability of establishing a low and uniform rate of postage throughout the provinces. Relative to the Quebec and Halifax Railway, the Governor observed that the officers employed in exploring the country, with the view of discovering the best line to connect those ports, had presented a report strongly in favour of the proposed undertaking. The provision of funds for the early completion of the St. Lawrence Canals was strongly urged; and the subject of the depressed condition of the commercial affairs of the provinces formed a leading feature of the Address. The support of common schools was also alluded to. The Governor announced the setting apart a portion of the public domain, in order that the revenue derived therefrom might form a fund, the interest of which should be applied to their support. The amendment of the existing Militia Act was intended.

THE WEST INDIES.

According to intelligence from Jamaica, which is dated to the 7th ultimo, our colonial Government is by no means secure in that important island. In the summary of news from the West Indies which we published in our paper of the 13th ult., we noticed the error which had crept into the Import Duties (continuance) Bill. The act was passed on the 31st of December, on which day the revenue was to cease, unless the expenditure of the island was reduced according to the distressed condition of the times; but, on reaching the Council Chamber, the clause to extend to December was struck out [illegible] The Council passed the bill immediately, and the Governor expressed his intention to do the same; in consequence of which, at the end of December, the popular branch of the Legislature was not in session, and the bill, as it now stood, consequently, have expired on the 31st. Under these circumstances, Sir Charles Grey was unable to give his assent to the bill; and, rather than lose the revenue, his prorogued the House and called them together again the same day, when they again passed the bill to the 15th of February. Mr. H. A. Whitelock, member of the Assembly for Westmoreland, having published a letter on the subject in the Jamaica Dispatch, in which he said "the Council passed the bill in the way they wished to receive it, and that one of the members was aware of the error," the Council, which is composed of colonial officials, considered this sentence a "breach of their privileges," and, declaring it a false and scandalous libel, ordered the Usher of the Black Rod to bring before them the editor of the Dispatch, William Grout. Accordingly, Mr Grout was taken to the bar of the Council Chamber on the 28th of December; he admitted having published the letter, but refused to say anything further until a copy of the warrant under which he was taken was furnished him. The Council refused to supply him with it, and forthwith committed him to Spanish Town Gaol, where he was to remain "during their pleasure." The friends of the Despatch and Mr Grout—indeed, the whole island—were indignant at this proceeding of the Council, which was considered most unjust and unprecedented. Mr. Grout moved for his discharge under the Habeas Corpus Act, but Mr. Justice Macdougall refused to grant it. He therefore remains incarcerated. Liberal subscriptions had been made to enable him to have recourse to legal means of redress; and it was anticipated that the act of the Council would be a great step towards its reformation, for, composed as it is at present of public officers, and considered inimical to the public good.

The weather in the island had become pleasant. At Antonio Bay, a good deal of damage had been done by the heavy rains and the overflowing of the rivers.

The condition of the colony is described as truly distressing. Commerce had dwindled to almost nothing!

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.—The following papers were issued on Monday last:—A list of the Houses of Lords and Commons, of the names of all governors and lieutenant-governors of the different colonies, states, and territories, dates of appointment, and place of residence, with the amount of their pay and emoluments as governors. Account of public income and expenditure for year ending 5th January, 1849.—Mr. Speaker's warrant for the appointment of members to serve on the General Committee of Elections

CLERGY ORPHAN CORPORATION.—The annual general court of this Corporation was held on Saturday last at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of receiving a statement of accounts and electing 11 children for admission into the asylum; the Bishop of London in the chair. The Secretary read the report, which stated that the receipts for the past year, together with a balance of £[illegible] 19s. 1d. from the preceding year, amounted to £6433 13s 5d. The additional subscriptions to the amount of £1008 8s.; donations, £249 11s 6d.; legacies, £249 19s; and dividends on the funded property of the corporation to the amount of £2892 10s. 10d. The expenditure amounted to [illegible] including £2837 7s. 8d. for the maintenance of the boys, and £2[illegible] for the girls; leaving a balance of £2948 14s. 7d. against the society. The Bishop of London said it would be found from the report that there had been a considerable falling off in the annual contributions for the past year. This was to be attributed to the deaths of many of the aged members of the society. He believed that much good might be done by the members and friends of the Church, by making generally known the advantages of the society, which provided an education of the best description for those children who were placed under its care. The number of children who had been maintained by the society since its formation exceeded 1000. The children of every part of England and Wales might partake of the benefits of the Institution, and those who were placed under its protection were provided with excellent accommodation, and the best medical attendance. The present establishment commodates 140 children of both sexes, who undergo an annual examination before the President, Vice-President, and friends of the charity. He believed he only expressed the feeling of the Vice-President and members of the committee, when he said that it was their earnest desire that some steps should be taken to give increased publicity to the operations of the institution, and that they confidently hoped that the present appeal would be responded to. The election of the children was then proceeded with, and the following is a list of the successful candidates:—Girls.—Ann Bray, Isabella Fordiffe, Anne Heawood, Mary Hall, Mary Musgrove Marshall, and Fanny Elizabeth Parker. Boys.—William Frederic Clayton, James Heape Evans, Edward De Tedney Collins, Alfred Brown, and Charles Hodgson Swales. The Bishop of London was then re-elected President, and Sir Robert Inglis Vice-President, for the ensuing year

COUNTRY NEWS.

PORTSMOUTH ELECTION.—The vacancy created in the representation of this borough, by the acceptance of the office of First Lord of the Admiralty by Sir F. T. Baring, was filled up on Tuesday, by the re-election of that right hon. gentleman. The proceedings at the hustings, in the square of Portsea, were of the ordinary character. At half past 12 o'clock Edward Carter, Esq., of Portsmouth, one of the oldest Whigs in the place, and the oldest magistrate of the candidate living, proposed him to be re-elected, and he was seconded by James Hoskins, Esq., the chairman of his general committee. Sir Francis Baring then addressed the assembly, and no other candidate having been proposed, the returning officer (the Mayor) declared Sir Francis Baring duly elected to serve in Parliament as one of the borough of Portsmouth.

CASE OF MR. BURGE, LATE COMMISSIONER OF BANKRUPTCY.—In the Insolvent Debtors Court, at York, last week, Mr. Burge applied to the Judge, R. Wharton, Esq., under the 28th section of the 7 & 8 Vict., cap. 96, to name a day for his protection and discharge, having regard to the length of imprisonment he had already suffered. His Honor, after some discussion with Mr. Burge, named the 24th of February, the next court day, for making the order for his protection and discharge, and the petitioner was directed to give notice to those creditors who had opposed Mr. Burge at the former meeting.

THE MAIL ROBBERY.—Last week, at the Guildhall, Exeter, Mr. Willesford applied to the bench for the restoration to the prisoners connected with the robbery of the property taken from them at the time of their apprehension, namely, to Nightingale, a gold watch, diamond ring, &c.; and to Bond, a £5 promissory note, &c., for the purpose of enabling them to meet the expenses incident to their defence (there being no suspicion, as the learned gentleman said, that these articles had been surreptitiously obtained, or were the fruits of the robbery against the prisoners). The application was met by a decided refusal from the bench, one of the magistrates observing that Peile had a considerable sum in one of the banks in Exeter, and that he had been so advised by one of the bankers.

CHARGE OF ROBBERY BY A MERCANTILE CLERK.—A charge, which, on account of the high respectability of the accused, and his previous excellent repute, excited the utmost interest, was heard before the magistrates at Bristol on Monday. Christopher Matthew Shaw West, a confidential clerk in the extensive firm of Miles and Kingston, West India merchants, who had been brought from Hamburgh in custody of Inspector Bosworth, was charged with stealing a crown piece valuable only for £500, the property of William Miles, Esq. M.P. for East Somerset, and P. W. S. Miles, Esq., M.P. for Bristol, as executors of the will of the late P. J. Miles, Esq., of Leigh Court. Mr. Philip Miles proved that the security in question (a note of the Bristol and Gloucester Railway Company for £500) was a part of the estate and effects of his late father, and spoke to a conversation with the prisoner on the 16th of January, in which he admitted that he had taken possession of it and deposited it with Mr. Robert Goss, a stock and sharebroker, by way of security for moneys advanced to him. The prisoner had no right or authority to dispose of the note in any such way, and by so doing had dishonestly appropriated it to himself. The statement was made by him, not in consequence of any threat held out, but in the course of a private conference with some other matters. Mr. Goss stated that some time ago the prisoner asked him if he could raise him £500 upon a loan note of the Gloucester Railway, and he told him he could do so. About the 8th of January last he brought the loan note, and on the 16th witness advanced him the money. Inspector Bosworth deposed that he was sent in pursuit of the accused, and having traced him to London, and discovered that he had drawn a cheque by one of the steamers for Hamburgh, he obtained a communication from the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the British chargé d'affaires there, and went in pursuit. In consequence of a communication made by Colonel Hodges to the authorities, the Senate passed a decree authorising the arrest of the prisoner, who was straightway given into his custody, and brought by him to England. After hearing some further evidence of a less material character, the magistrates fully committed him for trial.

MURDER NEAR BRIGHTON.—On Wednesday morning, a little before four o'clock, information was given at the Brighton Town Hall, by Mr. Hodson and Mr. Kirton, that Mr. Griffith, the brewer, had been murdered. Those gentlemen had been out on a shooting excursion, and on their way homewards at a very late hour they discovered a body lying on the road between Dale gate and the Ploughs at Ditchling Beacon, which, on investigation, turned out to be Mr. Griffith. It was resting on the back, and life was extinct. The hat of the deceased was picked up a few yards off; his pockets were turned inside out and rifled, and a wound was discovered in the chest, showing that he had been shot through the body by his assailant. The gig whip and part of a rein, cut, were also picked up on the spot, leaving no doubt that deceased had been waylaid by highwaymen. No clue has yet been found to the discovery of the perpetrators of the crime.

POST-OFFICE ROBBERY AT CARMARTHEN.—We have already noticed the fact that one of the daughters of the postmaster at Carmarthen is now in gaol awaiting her trial for stealing money letters. It is now stated that about £200 in foreign money orders had in the possession of the young lady, other property, such as purses, jewellery, and other fancy articles, amounting in value in aggregate, including the cash, to about £500; and we have been requested to state that it is particularly desired that persons who have lost money by this robber properly, will immediately give information to the post-office authorities in London, with accurate descriptions of lost property, so that, if amongst the articles that have been found, all such may be identified and restored to the owners. The professional gentleman representing the Postmaster-General in the recent investigation of the matter said that he felt it necessary and just towards the postmaster, and the other parties implicated in the case, to state that he was convinced that neither of them had any knowledge of these transactions; he also felt bound to say that, in furthering the ends of justice in that inquiry, he had received every facility from the postmaster, Mr. Lloyd.

LEOMINSTER ELECTION.—On Tuesday, Mr. Frederick Peel, son of Sir Robert Peel, was elected M.P. for this borough, in the room of Mr. R. Barlee, lately nominated to the Governorship of British Guiana. There was no other candidate, Mr. Philemore and Sir E. B. Lytton having retired from the contest.

SERIES OF CHARGES AGAINST AN ATTORNEY'S CLERK.—On Monday, Thomas Whitehead, attorney's clerk, was brought from the previous Saturday, on a charge of embezzlement. The prisoner was formerly in the service of Messrs. Umbers and Sowdon, solicitors, of Cheltenham and Stratford-upon-Avon. It appeared that the prosecutors drew the cheque in favour of a man named Brown, and sent it to him through the prisoner, who appropriated it to his own use, though he had declared, in a letter to his employers, that he had handed it over to Brown. He was committed for trial. He was then charged with stealing a cheque for £30 M. Umbers swore having sent a cheque, which he was requested to pay to a person named Williams, but which he caused, keeping the money himself. The prisoner was committed on this charge also. He was again charged with embezzling two sums of £21 and £2 13s., the property of Messrs. Umbers and Sowdon. The case was proved on the evidence of James Conlon, who deposed that he employed Mr Whitehead to get him through the Insolvent Court in the months of May last, and paid him the proceedings. He gave to Whitehead the two sums charged. The moneys were paid [illegible] Messrs. Umbers and Sowdon's offices, but were kept by the prisoner. Committed [illegible]

ON Tuesday he was again brought up for obtaining money from Messrs. Richard and Sons, ironmongers, in the name of Umbers, and for stealing numbers of papers, the property of Messrs. Umbers and Sowdon. On both of these charges, also, he was committed to the assizes, bail in the sum of £[illegible]

HULL ELECTION.—Mr. Talbot Baines, the recently appointed Chief of the Poor-law Commission, in the room of Mr. Charles Buller, was re-elected on Wednesday by the H.P. for Hull, without opposition.

AN unusual number of sudden deaths have lately occurred in Chatham and its neighbourhood. Among others we may mention that of Dr. Curtoise, physician to the forces, who appears to have been only a day or two unwell prior to his decease. Mr. Ranvall, of the Mitre Hotel, has lost his two sons within one week; and an elderly man named Mallett, a storekeeper labourer in the Royal Dockyard, dropped down dead a few evenings ago. The village of Ingham, in the county of Chatham, which lately experienced a severe attack of cholera, is now almost free from it, but a few cases have occurred in Troy town, near Rochester.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

THE ROYAL ETCHINGS—INJUNCTION AFFIRMED, WITH COSTS.

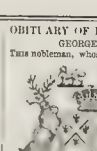
PRINCE ALBERT v. STRANGE—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. STRANGE.—The interest with which the public looked forward for the determination of this cause was manifested by the crowded state of the court, and also by the full attendance of counsel on Thursday, the 25th ult., when it was heard. Immediately that the Lord Chancellor had taken his seat, his Lordship proceeded to read his judgment. The defendant, it will be remembered, sought for the dissolution of an injunction granted to the plaintiff by the Vice-Chancellor Court, restraining him from printing or publishing, either by himself or his agents, a catalogue descriptive of a gallery of etchings made by Prince Albert and her Majesty the Queen. His Lordship took a very elaborate review of the evidence, and concluded by dismissing the application to have the injunction dissolved, with full costs.

THE RUSSELL-COURT GRAVEYARD.—A deputation of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Martin's-in-the Fields, accompanied by Mr. Palmer and Mr. Jervis, the churchwardens, waited upon the Bishop of London, at his residence in St. James-square, at the close of last week, to present a memorial to the bishop, praying him to use his authority to put a stop to the interments of the dead in the St. Mary-le-Strand burial-ground, Russell-court, Drury-lane; which, notwithstanding the recent verdict of the Coroner's Jury in the case of a female named Mary Jaggett—whose demise was found to have been accelerated by breathing the noxious exhalations emanating therefrom, and the testimony of numerous medical gentlemen that the continuation of burials therein was dangerous, and likely to cause a pestilence—were still continued. His Lordship read the memorial to the observations of Dr. Bainbridge, Mr. Lancaster, and Mr. Shearsmith, assuring the deputation that the subject should have his earnest and earliest attention, and that his Archdeacon should visit the ground forthwith. The deputation then withdrew.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

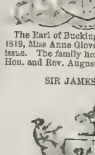
GEORGE ROBERT, EARL OF BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.

THIS nobleman, whose death occurred on the 1st inst., was eldest son of the Hon. George Vere Hobart, and succeeded to the title, as fifth Earl, at the decease of his uncle in 1816. The ancient name of Hampden he added to his patronymic Hobart, as a lineal descendant of the very ancient family of Hampden of Hampden. The parent stock whence sprang the illustrious patriot, John Hampden. Paternally, his Lordship represented the house of Hobart of Blickling, in Norfolk, which was founded by Sir Henry Hobart, an eminent lawyer, and Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in the time of James I.



The Earl of Buckinghamshire was born 1st May, 1789, and married, 3rd May, 1815, Lady Glevering, daughter of Sir Arthur Paget, K.C., by whom he had no issue. The family honours devolve, consequently, on his Lordship's brother, the Hon. and Rev. Augustus Edward Hobart, Prebendary of Wolverhampton.

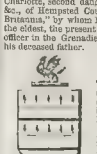
SIR JAMES CARNEGIE, SIXTH BART. OF SOUTHESK.



SIR JAMES died at Kinnaur Castle 30th January, in the fifty-first year of his age. He was the elder son and heir of the late Sir David Carnegie, Bart., and grandson of Sir James Carnegie, M.P., who became, at the decease of James, fifth Earl of Southesk, lineal heir male, and representative of that branch of the family. The property, which was alienated by the attainder of James, fifth Earl of Southesk, after the rising of 1715, has been gradually purchased back, and on the late Sir James's [illegible] the period of his [illegible] engaged in proceedings before the House of Lords for the recovery of the [illegible] dormant dignity, which [illegible] for the Montrose Barghs, but retired on the passing of the Reform Bill, having been returned for the Montrose Burghs.

Sir James succeeded to the Baronetcy in 1805, and married at Naples, in 1[illegible], Charlotte, second daughter of the late Rev. Daniel Lysons, M.A., F.A.S., R.S., &c., of Hempsted Court, county Gloucester, the well-known author of the "Magna Britannia," by whom he has left three sons and two daughters; of the former, the eldest, the present Sir James Carnegie, Bart., who was born in 1827, is an officer in the Grenadier Guards, and succeeds to the title and fine estates of his deceased father.

THE HON. THOMAS HUGH NUGENT



THE death of this gentleman, which occurred in London, on the 3rd instant, devolves the succession to the Earldom of Westmeath (in case the present Marquis leave no male issue) to William Thomas Nugent, commonly called Lord Riverstown.

Mr Thomas Hugh Nugent was half brother and heir presumptive of the Marquis of Westmeath, being last surviving son of George Frederick, seventh Earl, by the Lady Elizabeth Emily Moore, his second wife, daughter of Charles, first Marquis of Drogheda. He was born 3rd September, 1807, and had, consequently, completed his 41st year. He never married.

ADMISSION TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—On Saturday the following was issued at the House of Lords:—"The Lord Great Chamberlain's Office will be opened on Wednesday next, the 7th inst., and every succeeding Wednesday, between the hours of [illegible] for tickets to the public to view the House of Lords. Signed, WILLOUGHBY D'ERESBY."

THE GOLD-SEEKERS OF CALIFORNIA.

THE accounts which have been received this week from the United States convey intelligence of the most startling character. The Washington Union contains a letter from Lieutenant Larkin, dated Monterey, November 16, received at the State Department, containing further confirmation of the previous despatches, public and private, and far outstripping in other respects in the existing character. The gold was increasing in size and quality daily. Lumps were found weighing from 1 lb to 2 lb. Several had been heard of weighing as high as 15 lb., and one 25 lb. Many more such lumps were found, and worth 20,000 dollars by digging and trading with the Indians. 100 dollars a day is the average amount realised daily from July to October. Half the diggers were sick with fevers, though not many deaths had occurred among them. The fevers would readily give an ounce of gold for a common calico shirt—others were selling for 10 dollars each in specie. The gold regions extend over a tract of 300 miles, and it was not known that it did not extend 1000. A letter from Commodore Jones states that many of the petty officers and men had deserted and gone in search of the gold. He adds, the Indians were selling gold at 50c. the ounce. Many vessels were deserted by captain, cook, and seamen. The ship Brutus offered discharged soldiers 80 dollars per month to go to Callao, which was refused. She was supplied by Government sailors. All the naval vessels on the coast were short of hands. Nearly the whole of the 3rd Artillary had deserted. Provisions were scarce and high; board, 4 dollars a day; washing, 6 dollars a dozen. Robinson Crusoe's clerks get from 6000 to 8000 dollars a year.

From all the States of the Union, vessels crowded with passengers were sailing daily. Even vessels of the very worst description were eagerly bought at very high prices. Amongst the emigrants from New York we notice the name of Frederick Jerome, late seaman of the New World packet ship.

The New York Herald has some curiously interesting correspondence, dated Nov. 16th, from Monterey in California, on the same all-absorbing topic. It is mentioned in that journal that there were strong reasons for believing that Governor Mason had sold all his effects, men, mules, and waggons, were engaged digging on the banks of the Sacramento river. Colonel Stephenson had also disbanded his regiment, and gone on the like errand. This officer is said to have collected upwards of one million of dollars' worth of gold dust. Captain Marcy, son of the United States' Secretary of War, was engaged in the same pursuit. The Correspondent says:—

"We can now call ourselves citizens of the United States. We have now only to go by law, as we formerly went by custom, that is, when Congress gives us a government and code. The old foreign residents of California, having done very well 10 or 20 years without law, care less very little whether Congress pays early or late attention to the subject. Those who have emigrated from the Atlantic States within the last three or four years deem the subject an important one. I only call it difficult. The carrying into a code of laws, under existing circumstances, is far from being an easy task. The general Government may appoint Governors, secretaries, and other public functionaries; and judges, marshals, collectors, &c., may accept offices with salaries of 3000 dollars or 4000 dollars per annum; but how they are to obtain their petty officers, at half these sums, remains to be seen. The pay of a member of Congress will be accepted here by those alone who do not know enough to better themselves. Mechanics can now get 16 dollars to 16 dollars per day; labourers on the wharfs or steamers, 3 dollars to 10 dollars; clerks and storekeepers, 1000 dollars to 3000 dollars per annum; some engage to keep store during the day, or pleasure at 5 dollars per day, or 11b. to 14lb. of gold per month; cooks and stewards, 60 dollars to 100 dollars per month. In fact, labour of every description commands exorbitant prices. My previous information to you I merely forwarded to enable your office to open the way to the future relief of your many readers. I had not much expectation of being believed. The idea of mountains of quicksilver only wanting the ingenuity of man to make them pour forth as a stream—of rivers, whose bottoms and banks are of gold, is rather too much to play upon the credulity of New Yorkers or Yankees. I suppose my story passed as an enlarged edition of the 'Arabian Nights,' improved and adapted to California.

"Whether you or your readers took the tale for fiction or truth, I know not. Your last paper that has reached us is of April. This I know, the Sandwich Islands, Oregon, and Lower California are fast parting with their inhabitants, all bound to this coast, and hence to the great 'placer' of the Sacramento valley, where the digging and washing of one man that does not produce one hundred troy ounces of gold, twenty-three carats, from the size of a half spangle to one pennyweight in one month, set the diggers to 'prospecting,' that is, looking for better grounds. Your 'palsano' can point out many a man who has, for fifteen to twenty days in succession, bagged up five to ten ounces of gold a day. Our country, embracing all the creeks and branches on the east side of the river Sacramento and one side of the San Joaquin. In my travels I have, when resting under a tree and gnawing at some bones with pieces of pork stuck on them, picked out of the rocks or slate where we were stopping. On one occasion, morning or evening or in the side of a stream entirely unknown to diggers or 'prospecters,' or rather, if known, not attended to, as of no importance, I was in the act, I said, 'Give me a tin pan;' why should we not be cooking in gold sands?' He took a pan, filled it with sand, washed it out, and produced in five minutes two or three dollars' worth of gold, merely saying, 'Let us throw both pan and sand on the sand, I thought so.' Perhaps it is fair that your readers should learn, that, in winter, the Sacramento valley may afford gold, the obtaining of it has its disadvantages. From the 1st of April to the 1st of October, more or less, one-half of the people will have fever and ague, or intermittent fever. In the winter it is too cold to work in the water. Some work in the sand by washing from the surface in a wooden bowl, or tin pan; some gouge it out from the rocks or slate; the more lazy ones roll about and pick up the large pieces, leaving the small gold for the next emigration. The extent of the gold region on the San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers extends a distance of 800 miles in length by 100 in width. It embraces not only gold, but quantities of quicksilver in almost equal abundance. It is estimated that a small population actively engaged in mining operations in that region could export 100,000,000 dollars in gold in every year, and that an increased population might increase that mount to 300,000,000 dollars annually. You may believe me when I say that for some time to come California will export, yearly, nearly or quite 500,000 ounces of gold, 22 to 24 carats fine; some pieces of that will weigh 16 lb., very many 1 lb. Many men who began last June to dig gold with a capital of 50 dollars, can now show 5000 dollars to 15,000 dollars. I saw a man to-day making purchases of dry goods, &c., for his family, lay on the counter a bag made of raw hide, well sewed up, containing 100 ounces. I observed, 'That is a good way to pack gold dust.' His very innocently replied, 'All the bags I brought down are that way; I like the size!' Five such bags in New York would bring nearly 10,000 dollars. This man left his family last August. Three months digging and washing, producing four or five bags of 100 ounces each, is better than being mate of a vessel at 40 dollars per month, as the man formerly was. His companion, a Mexican, who camped and worked with him, only had two or three cowhide bags of gold. In this tough, but true, golden tale, you must not imagine that all men are equally successful. There are some who have done better—even to 4000 dollars in a month, many 1000 dollars during the summer; and others, who refused to join a company of gold washers who had a cheap made machine, and receive one ounce per day, that returned to the settlements with not a vest-pocket full of gold. Some left with only sufficient to purchase a horse and saddle, and pay the physician 6 ounces of gold for one ounce of quinine, calomel and jalap in proportion. An ounce of gold for advice given, six ounces a visit, brings the fever and ague to be rather an expensive companion. A 'well' man has his proportionate heavy expenses, also, to reduce his piles or bags of gold. Dry beef in the settlements at 4 cents per lb.; at the 'placer,' 1 dollar to 2 dollars per lb.; salt beef and pork, 50 dollars to 100 dollars per barrel; flour, 30 dollars to 75 dollars per barrel; coffee, sugar, and rice, 50 cents to 1 dollar per lb. As washing is 50 cents to 1 dollar a garment, many prefer throwing away their used-up clothes to paying the washerwoman; that is, if they intend returning to the settlements soon, where they can purchase more. As to shaving, I have never seen a man at the 'placer' who had time to perform that operation. They do not work on Sundays, only brush up the tent, blow out the emery or fine black sand from the week's work. Horses that can travel only one day, and from that to a week, are from 100 dollars to 200 dollars. Freight charged by launch owners for three days' run, 5 dollars per barrel. Waggoners charge 50 dollars to 100 dollars per load, 20 to 50 miles on good road. Corn, barley, peas, and beans, 10 dollars a bushel. Common pistols, any price; powder and lead very dear. I know a physician who, in San Francisco, purchased a common-made gold washer at 20 dollars or 30 dollars, made of 70 or 80 feet of boards. At a great expense he boated it up to the first landing on the Sacramento, and there met a waggoner bound to one of the diggings with an empty waggon, distant about 50 miles. The waggoner would not take up the machine under 100 dollars. The doctor had to consent, and bided his time. June passed over, rich in gold; all on that creek did wonders, when the waggoner fell sick, called on his friend the doctor, whose tent was in sight; the doctor came, but would not administer the first dose under the old sum of 100 dollars, which was agreed to, under the proviso that the following doses should be furnished more moderate. When a man's time is worth 100 dollars a day to use a spade and tin pan, neither doctors or waggoners can think much of a pound of gold, and you may suppose merchants, traders, and pedlars are not slow to make their fortunes in these golden times. In San Francisco there is more merchandize sold now monthly than before in a year. Vessels after vessels arrive, land their cargoes, dispose of them, and bag up the dust and lay up the vessel, as the crew are soon among the missing. The cleanest clear out is where the captain follows the crew. There are many vessels in San Francisco that cannot weigh anchor, even with the assistance of three or four neighbouring vessels. Supercargoes must land cargoes on arriving, or have no crew to do it for them. Some vessels continue to go to sea with small crews at fifty dollars per month for green hands.

Colonel Stevenson's regiment is disbanded; 99 out of 100 of whom have also gone 'prospecting,' including the colonel, who arrived in Monterey last month, from his last post, and was met by his men at the edge of the town to escort and cheer him into the town. The captain, who has been bought up country carts and oxen, turned drivers, and gone to the 'placer.' Our worthy Governor, Colonel of 1st Dragoons, &c., having plenty of carts, waggons, horses, and mules, with a few regulars left, has also gone, but under better advantages, for the second or third time, to see the 'placer' and the country, and have justice done to his countrymen or himself. Commodore Jones, lately arrived in Monterey, supposed it to be the capital, head-quarters, &c., but found not even the Governor left. Where head-quarters is may be uncertain, whether in Monterey, Sutter's Fort, or in a four-mule waggon travelling over the gold region. Now, whether head-quarters are freighted with munitions of war, &c., or whether the cargo consists of blankets, shirts, &c., to clothe the suffering Indians for the paltry consideration of gold, no one cares or knows. But the principle should be that if privates can or will be off making their thousands, those who are better able should not go goldless."

To this intelligence we add a few details, with a View of Monterey, from a recent Sketch by Captain W. J. Handley, of the brig Clementina. Dr. Tyrwhitt Brooks has just published a very interesting work, entitled "Four Months among the Gold-diggers of California;" in which he thus describes Monterey:—

"Monterey seems to be a rising town. The American style of houses is superseding the old mud structures, and numbers of new buildings are being run up every month. The hotel we stopped at has only been recently opened by an American. Monterey is, moreover, a port of some importance, if one may judge from the number of vessels lying at anchor."

The Doctor's arrival in the Sacramento Valley is thus sketched:—

"May 29th.—Last night we encamped under a group of oaks, and 'we knew by the smoke that so gracefully curled' over other parts of the valley, that there were several other camps pitched at no great distance. When we started in the morning we fell in with a few parties moving towards the Sacramento. A ride of a few hours brought us to the borders of that noble river, which was here about a couple of hundred yards wide, and we immediately made preparations for crossing it. After several mishaps and delays, we at length succeeded in getting over in a launch. The new town of Suttersville, numbering some ten or twelve houses, is laid out within half a mile of the banks of the river. From here a wide road or a level plain spreadeth out into fields of wheat and pasture-grounds, dotted with hundreds upon hundreds of grazing cattle, and here and there a loitering team brought us to Sutter's Fort, an extensive block of building planted on the top of a small hill with oak skirts a creek running into the Americanos, near its junction with the Rio Sacramento. A schooner and some small craft were heating up the Americanos River towards the Fort, and alongside the landing-place several launches were lying unshipping cargoes. As we made the spot, we soon saw that here all was bustle and activity. Boatmen were shouting and swearing; waggoners were whistling and hallooing and cracking their whips at their straining horses, as these toiled along with heavily-laden waggons to the different stores within the building; groups of horsemen were riding to and fro, and crowds of people were moving about on foot. It was evident that the gold mania increased in force as we approached the now eagerly longed for El Dorado.

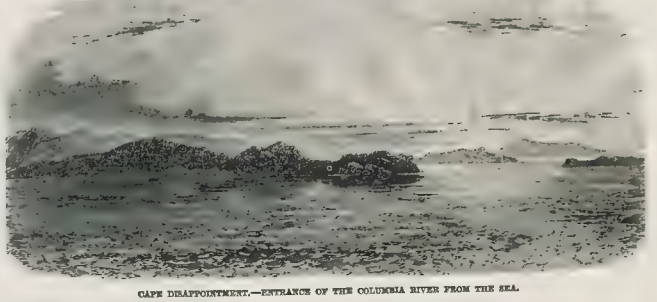
* * * * *

"As may be imagined, the whole scene was one well calculated to take a strong hold upon the imagination. The eminences, rising gradually from the river's banks, were dotted with white canvass tents, mingled with the more sombre-looking huts, constructed with once green, but now withered branches. A few hundred yards from the river lay a large heap of planks and framings, which I was told were intended for constructing a store; the owner of which, a sallow Yankee, with a large plushy cigarette in his mouth, was labouring away in his shirt-sleeves."

The View of the Sacramento Valley upon the front page of the present Number is from the Journal of the United States' Exploring Expedition, the plates of which possess extraordinary spirit and fidelity.

THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY AND VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

Now that the Crown has disposed of Vancouver's Island to the Hudson's Bay Company, for immediate colonisation, it may be interesting to glance at the condition of another of their establishments, Fort George, or Astoria, on the Columbia River, which we are enabled to represent from a recent Sketch by a correspondent; together with a view of Cape Disappointment, the northern head of entrance into the Columbia, from which Fort Vancouver is situated eighty-two miles, as the crow flies. Captain Sir Edward Belcher, in his Voyage round the World, thus describes this locality:—



CAPE DISAPPOINTMENT.—ENTRANCE OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER FROM THE SEA.

"The shoals in the entrance of this river have most materially changed their features within the last two years. Just at our last tack, which would have taken us safely to our anchorage, the ship tailed, and the flood forced her instantly on the bank, where it continued to press her inwards. Before any distance could be rendered, the tide fell, and our anchors being already down, we had to await the night tide, when less sea prevails. She floated off on the flood, a breeze off shore having helped her, and anchored in security until the morning, when we weighed and ran up to our berth in Baker's Bay. Not so the Starling: in weighing (in ten fathoms) she tailed, and instantly lost her rudder.

"I had not then decided upon taking her up to Fort Vancouver, but this now became necessary; and having seen the ship securely moored, and constructed a temporary rudder for the Starling, we started on the morning of the 31st for Fort George.

"On the Starling's arrival, Lieutenant Kellett communicated with Mr. Douglas, the chief of the Hudson Bay Company at Fort Vancouver, who very promptly sent us a guide, pilot, and interpreter; and Messrs. M'Leod and Birnie came down to call on him. The latter is clerk in charge of Fort George. Off this fort, the well-known Fort Astoria of Washington Irving, we anchored for the night. It has dwindled considerably since the Hudson's Bay Company took charge, who removed their chief establishment to Fort Vancouver, and allowed it to run to utter ruin. Not a vestige remains.

"A small house for Mr. Birnie, two or three sheds for the Canadians, about six or eight in number, and a pine stick with a red ensign, now represented Fort George. Not a gun or warlike appearance of any kind remains. One would rather take it for the commencement of a village than any noted fort. The scenery is similar to that of all the northern coast—wooded to the water's edge, and differing little excepting in the varieties of pine. The outline is leasing, but no field for the painter, there being no contrast of tints, and too stiff an outline.

"The navigation is rather cramped, and it is really surprising that, with so much capital at stake in shipping, &c., the company have not brought up a set of pilots, by which many thousands might have been saved, independent of the freedom of such an useful body of men.

"After walking the bounds of ci-devant Astoria, in company with Mr. Birnie, who explained where its lines formerly occupied, but where wildness and desolation now reigns, as well as examined the great fir mentioned by Douglas, Mr. Birnie accompanied us on board to dinner, and afforded us much valuable information respecting the river as well as the natives."

In the Illustration, to the left, is shown the Hudson's Bay Company Establishment; to the right of which is an Indian lodge; and to the extreme right a settler's log-hut.

The entrance of the Columbia River is a very difficult one, where it was stated in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, about two months since, the Hudson's Bay Company's barque Vancouver became a complete wreck; the ribs and trunks of two American men-of-war are likewise buried in its sands, besides another two other vessels.

The view of Astoria gives an idea of the vast growth of timber on that coast; and, it acquires a new interest from its being the intended port of communication with the United States, via Panama and San Francisco.

Another point of interest on the Columbia is "Coffin Rock," an isolated rock on the right, of about sixty yards circumference. This has long been a favourite burial-place of the Indians, and from that circumstance is very appropriately termed "the Coffin Rock." Its summit is covered with a few stunted bushes; from among which rise the bows of numberless canoes, which have for ages past been deposited there as receptacles for the dead.

We may here add that a steam communication is proposed between San Francisco, in Upper California, and the Columbia River; a measure which, it is reasonable to expect, will be accelerated by the vast importance which San Francisco must acquire as the port of the gold district.

Steam communication is also projected between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands, of which the port of Honolulu is the capital and the seat of Government. The same improvement will, probably, be extended to the port of Monterey.

Honolulu is the chief place in Oahu, or Woahoo, the most important island of the Sandwich group, being the seat of Government, and the place in which the foreign commerce is concentrated. It contains, also, a larger proportion of cultivated land than the other islands

Honolulu consists of a few stone houses built by foreign merchants, and the huts of the natives, not arranged in regular streets; but the Chiefs have houses built in the European style. Vessels constructed here, and manned by natives, many years since, traversed the Pacific to Canton. The harbour is small, being not more than half a mile long and a quarter broad, but it is tolerably deep and perfectly safe.

FLOATING CHURCH FOR SEAMEN AND BOATMEN.

This singular edifice now floats on the waters of the Delaware River, at Bordentown; and, in a few weeks, we are informed, will be towed to Philadelphia, and moored permanently at one of the wharfs designated by the city authorities, for the benefit of the seamen and boatmen who frequent that port. The seats are all to be free.

The Floating Church was designed and built by a self-taught architect and builder of New York, Mr. Clement L. Dennington, for the Churchman's Missionary Association for the seamen of the port of Philadelphia. The interior decorations are executed by H. and O. Ficht, of Philadelphia, who painted in fresco the ceiling of Our Saviour, in New York, which has been so much admired as a work of art.

The Floating Church will be a great novelty and ornament in Philadelphia, where so few spires are to be seen: and, located at the foot of one of the level streets, will be discerned at the distance of a mile in the centre from its locality. By the published documents of the association, the following gentlemen compose the Board of Managers, by whose efforts the edifice has been erected, assisted by benevolent individuals of that city, who feel an interest in the religious benefit of the class for whom it is intended:—Right Rev. Bishop Potter, D.D., James C. Booth, William C. Kent, John M. Gellium, Isaac Welsh, George Colhoun, G. B. Mitchell, Edward L. Clark, T. R. Wuchserer, Joseph R. Massey, Joseph E. Hover, William G. Allen, James M. Aertsen, George S. Twells. The Chaplain in charge of the Church is the Rev. Mr. Trapier, formerly a lieutenant in the navy, and now an ordained minister in the Episcopal Church.

The building is firmly fastened on a substantial dock 38 feet by 90, with guards extending 8 feet outside around it, and resting on two boats of 60 tons each, placed ten feet apart, and strongly connected together. The Church will seat 500 persons, and is to have a fine-toned organ and bell. The top of the spire is 70 feet from the deck; and the edifice is 32 feet wide by 65 long, including th vestry.

FLOATING CHURCH FOR PHILADELPHIA

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

MR. THOMAS CHISHOLM ANSTEY

Mr. Anstey sits for the borough of Youghal, for which he was first returned in 1847. He is the second son of a highly respectable landed proprietor in Van Diemen's Land, a Member of Council there, and was born in 1816. His family is Protestant; but he himself coming over to England to be educated, was, when young, converted to Catholicity. He was educated at Wellington, in Somersetshire; and at University College, London.

Mr. Anstey adopted the profession of the law, and, while a student, was distinguished as an active and ardent member of the legal debating societies. He was called to the bar by the Society of the Middle Temple, the 25th Jan., 1839. He married soon after a Miss Strickland, an Irish Catholic lady of good family, and went to carry on his profession in Van Diemen's Land. There he was made Judge of the Insolvent Court; but getting into some disagreement with the authorities of the place, he threw up his appointment, and returned to England. He then joined the Northern Circuit, and was an attendant for some time at the Manchester Sessions. He afterwards more exclusively devoted himself to Chancery practice, and he has been employed in that department with advantage in some very important cases. He is the author of many articles in the periodicals, and of a very able treatise on the laws affecting Roman Catholics. As a writer, Mr. Anstey is correct, powerful, and fluent. His learning, too, is profound and extensive. His election for Youghal, and his subsequent Parliamentary notoriety, are of too recent date to need record here.

He is a man of energetic and violent mind; but he is, at the same time, perfectly upright and honest. During his whole life, he has never allowed his interests to interfere with his chivalrous and almost Quixotic integrity.

MR. T. C. ANSTEY, M.P.

Mr. Anstey is a Liberal in politics, and favours the Repeal of the Union both with Ireland and Scotland. He took part in the debate of Tuesday night, on the motion of Sir George Grey, for the continuance of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, when Mr. Anstey addressed the House against both the motion and the amendment. He admitted the reality of the insurrection of last year, which was put down, and of the existing disaffection in Ireland; yet he considered the grounds put forward in support of the measure utterly insufficient to justify an invasion of the personal liberty of the subject. For the same reasons, he maintained, a committee of inquiry would be fruitless. On the same evening, the hon. Member moved for leave to bring in a bill for the further repeal of enactments imposing penalties upon Roman Catholics, this being substantially the same bill as he introduced last session. He was pressed to withdraw the measure, as ill-timed; and, on declining to do so, the House divided, and the bill was rejected by a majority of 2.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BALLANTINE, THE MAGISTRATE.—This gentleman, one of the oldest stipendiary magistrates of the metropolis, who has filled at the Thames Police Court for more than 27 years, having for some time past suffered from ill health, has tendered his resignation, which was accepted in a compl mentary letter from Sir George Grey on Wednesday

LETCHER-SQUARE SCHOOL FOR KITCHEN-GARDENERS.—The number of destitute persons of both sexes who have applied at this establishment for relief for the past week has been unusually great, and many have been compelled to depart unrelieved, on account of the funds not being adequate to the demand. In addition to the enormous expense already incurred by the committee, they have erected a new boiler, with a view of further softening down the distresses of this applicants, who are besieging the institution at all hours of the day. And, besides affording (gratuitously) a good nourishing meal of soup and bread to nearly 1200 persons per day, a refuge is opened for about 40 persons by night, where they are accommodated with a supper, clean bed, and breakfast, and, before their departure in the morning, the essential addition of an ablution, through the medium of the lavatories attached to the premises. In this institution, females of respectable character who, through uncontrollable causes, have been thrown out of employment, are provided with shelter until such time as an opportunity offers to become replaced, and several have lately left the asylum and entered into respectable situations

ASYLUM FOR INVALID GENTLEWOMEN.—It is proposed to make an appeal to the benevolence of the public for the establishment of two hundred pounds. a class of persons for whose wants no public hospitals, as such places are at present constituted, are adapted This class consists of gentlewomen of moderate means, or who are dependent for support on their own exertions, and more especially of those in the country who find it necessary to visit the metropolis for medical treatment Such persons are, unfortunately, too frequently unable to bear the expense of medical advice, or even of such comforts as invalids cannot do without. The proposition for this asylum is at present in its infancy, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to enter into a detail of the plan. It will be necessary to raise a sum of money to enable the proposers of it to carry out their praiseworthy object; and, for this purpose, the sympathies of the philanthropic and affluent must be awakened. When the expenses necessary for obtaining proper premises and for furnishing them are defrayed, it may be hoped and expected that the institution will become, to a great degree, a self-supporting one. The first step has been taken, and a temporary committee of ladies has been formed, amongst whom are Ladies Ashley, Canning, Erle, and Rolfe, Lady Caroline Stirling, and several others of rank and fashion. The names of several very influential supporters of public institutions have also been subscribed as a committee for managing the affairs of the institution; and, as far as the design has hitherto progressed, there is a prospect of a favourable result. Such an institution has been long wanted; and, in these days, when public provision is made for almost every kind of want, it would be strange if an institution of this character could not be founded and rendered most admirable in affording relief and ameliorating misery.]

MEDICAL REPORTS ON THE CHOLERA.—The fourth official circular of the Board of Health has just appeared. It contains two documents bearing on cholera, by the two chief medical ascertaining inspectors to the Board, Dr. Grainger and Dr. Sutherland; the one being extracts from a report on the progress of the cholera in Hamburg and Berlin, by Mr. Grainger; the other an account of the measures taken for the suppression of the very serious outbreak of the disease that occurred at Dumfries. Dr. Sutherland sums up his experience, during a period of very arduous hours in the Scotch towns that have suffered most from the epidemic, in the following terms:—The practical conclusion must be self-evident, namely, that the only means of dealing with cholera as a pestilence is the immediate organisation, in every locality where it appears, of some, or a staff of visitors to go from house to house, for the purpose of discovering and treating on the spot the slightest diarrhœal symptoms. It has been proved by melancholy experience both in Dumfries and Glasgow, that neither rich nor poor will, of their own free choice, apply for medical aid until the time for its effe ent exercise is either passed, or the chances of recovery reduced to a very small proportion. The premonitory diarrhœa, in a large number of cases, attended with sensations rather agreeable than otherwise; the sufferer is lulled into a fatal security, and no alarm is consequently taken till it is too late

THE TOOTING CHOLERA CASES.—YESTRY MEETING BY THE REV. PANCRAS. On Wednesday a meeting of the vestry of St Pancras was held for the purpo s of requesting Mr. Popham, one of the medical officers employed to attend the children in Mr Drouet's establishment at Tooting, to attend in the conduct in having attended a meeting at Westminster and made certain charges against the directors and guardians of the poor. Mr. Healey, a churchwarden, took the chair. Mr. T. B. Smith brought the subject forward, and complained that (according to the reports in the newspapers) Mr. Popham had stated at the meeti g in question that the guardians, when they visited Mr. Drouet's establishment, paid more attention to the cleanliness of their persons than to washing and drinking the good things placed before them, than to the condition and sufferings of the poor children. Mr. Popham, in explanation, said that in what he had stated respecting the guardians he had no allusion to the authorities of St. Pancras. He had a perfect right to attend a meeting upon such a subject, but the opinion he entertained towards Mr Drouet had since been altered very much changed. After a long discussion upon the alleged misconduct of Mr. Popham (who it appeared held offices under the Board of Directors of the parish), Mr. Barnes moved a resolution to the effect that the explanation given by Mr. Popham respecting the statement said to have been made by him on the 31st January was unsatisfactory and highly censurable. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Fetherington. An amendment was proposed, but the original motion was carried.

THE NUISANCE OF SMITHFIELD MARKET.—ON Monday, an infuriated [illegible] ran furiously through the [illegible] Smithfield Market, and [illegible] very serious injuries. Being further irritated by the concourse, it became perfectly uncontrollable, and proceeded at a headlong pace towards Holborn Hill-bridge, where the animal was secured, not, however, before it had knocked down and injured several parties.

ABATTOIRS.—SMITHFIELD AND ISLINGTON MARKET.—At a meeting of the Institution of Civil Engineers, held on Tuesday, a paper was read on the Abattoirs of Paris, by Mr. R. B Grantham. The subject was treated of chiefly in connexion with the sanatory question at present occupying so much attention, the author being of opinion that much public benefit would be derived from the introduction of similar establishments into the city of London. Previous to the opening of the abattoirs, in 1818, slaughter-houses existed in the crowded and populous districts of that city; and then (as at present in London) the passage of the cattle through the streets, and the consequent nuisances, were found to be intolerable. The five abattoirs were deemed a remedy towards obviate these evils, and were generally allowed to have fully accomplished the purposes for which they had been constructed; they had been of great public service, in rendering Paris free from those nuisances which were still permitted to exist as such blots on the general cleanliness of the City of London. The abattoirs were erected within the barriers, opposite Montmartre, Menil-Montant, Grenelle, Du Roule, and Ville Juif, at an average distance of a mile and three-quarters from the centre of the city. The mode of slaughtering the cattle, the melting the tallow, and other details connected with the trade, were minutely described. All the buildings were stated to be abundantly supplied with water, well ventilated, and kept in the highest state of cleanliness. It appeared that the revenue (derived from tolls charged upon all meat killed, at per kilogramme) amounted, during one year to £47,608 16s., that the total revenues were £4068 12s., leaving a profit to the city of Paris of £43,54 0s., or about 6¼ per cent. upon £680,000, the original cost of the establishments. The paper argued that if this revenue was obtained from the tolls, &c., for slaughtering meat for a population exceeding one million souls, who did not consume anything like the amount of animal food that Englishmen habitually indulge in, how much greater would be the profit of such public establishments for London, where there was a population of two millions of souls, in whose behalf such strenuous exertions were now making for the increase of sanitary regulations and more ample supplies of water, and everything tending towards the best state of health? Attached to the paper was a statement of the number of beasts, sheep, and calves, slaughtered in Paris, during the year 1847, with the prices of each, and the total amount of the tolls received. The paper stated

SEIZURE OF PORTRAITS IN PARIS.

The Illustration beneath represents an extraordinary scene which took place in Paris a few days since—the seizure of the Portraits of the Count de Chambord [illegible] affair is narrated by the artist, in a letter to La Patrie, dated Feb. 1, wherein he states that, on the previous Monday, about mid-day, his atelier was entered by the Commissioner of Police of the district in which his residence is situated, this officer being accompanied by four assistants and two gardiens of Paris: and they forthwith proceeded to take possession of a portrait of the Count de Chambord (Henri V.) and of the Countess, as they stated, by authority of the Prefec of Police.

In vain the painter protested most vehemently against the charge of having made the portraits a public exhibition: he had merely allowed them to be seen [illegible] Commissary of Police done. The Chambord, or rather [illegible] traits of Henri V. and his august lady, has, however, caused [illegible] Paris, as an indication of Legitimist feeling, which the police [illegible]

THE WREATH OF FLOWERS.—FROM A PICTURE BY POLLACK, PAINTED AT ROME.

Ye sweet Italian maids!
Twine roses 'mid the braids,
Or the rich tresses, of your flowing hair;
Silver and gold and gems
Could form no diadems
So beautiful as these upon your foreheads fair.

In your delicious land,
Where Nature's joyous hand
Scatters all bounty in profuse excess,
Well do the fragrant flowers,
Ye maidens of the bowers!
Interpret and adorn your kindred loveliness.

And yet I know not why
The monitory sigh
Steals to my lips unbidden, when I see
Such youthful maidens bring
The blossoms of the spring
To weave amid their locks in rich embroidery.

Most natural and meet,
Most beautiful and sweet,
The act and actors—both are redolent
Of grace and young delight,
And fancies pure and bright,
And all the opening dreams of fond hearts innocent.

But still a sadness wakes,
Amid the charm, and takes
A form of sympathy for those so young;
Who are too like the flower
In all their natural dower—
Tender as opening buds hidden the leaves among;—

Too like the flower in charm,
To 'scape the flow'ret's harm,
Deep admiration lasting but a day;
Ever in Fancy's view,
The buds of fairest hue
Are first to be desired, enjoy'd, and cast away.

Yet, sweet Italian maids!
Twine roses in the braids,
Or the loose tresses, of your flowing locks;
Enjoy your sunny clime,
And live your happy prime,
Alien to fears like these and all Misfortune's shocks.

Fair as the roses, bloom
In beauty and perfume—
By the rude spoiler's hand unpluck'd, unknown.
Buds of the human tree!
So artless and so free,
No rose's fate be yours, but all its charms alone.—C. M

MUSIC.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The opening of this theatre is fixed for saturday, March 10. Auber's opera, "La Muette de Portel," in five acts, will be performed on the first night, under the title of "Masaniello." This work, although it has enjoyed great popularity for many years on the Continent, has never before been represented in its integrity in this country. It will be powerfully cast at Covent Garden, Mario appearing in the principal character of the fisherman-monarch, Masaniello. Pietro will be sustained by M. Massol, the original representative of that part at the Académie Royale de Musique, in Paris; and the dumb girl, Fenella, will be enacted by the celebrated pantomimist and dancer, Mdlle. Pauline Leroux, who played it for many years at the Parisian Grand Opera.

The first début after the production of "Masaniello" will be that of Miss Catherine Hayes, our gifted countrywoman, who for the last four years, in Italy and Germany, has gained such laurels as a prima donna. Miss Hayes was a pupil of Manuel Garcia, the master of Jenny Lind, and brother of Viardot and Malibran. Miss Hayes is engaged to replace Mdme. Persiani in the repertoire. The prospectus for the season of the Royal Italian Opera will be issued next week. Mr. Costa is the musical director, composer, and conductor.

LONDON WEDNESDAY CONCERTS.

At the twelfth concert it is stated that upwards of 2000 persons were in Exeter Hall, every available space being crowded. Vieuxtemps appeared for the last time, and performed a beautiful Adagio and Rondo, "Scenes of my youth," from the opera of "The Gipsey's Warning," in the most exquisite style. Vieuxtemps is a master of intense expression of a flowing cantabile; his harmonics in two, three, or four parts, in the cadenza were really marvellous: a rapturous encore followed his perfect instrumental display. Miss Ellen Day played Thalberg's "Don Juan" fantasia, and Mr. G. Collins a violoncello solo; and Willy's band executed the overtures to "Tancredi," "Fidelio," and "Rosamunda," spiritedly—the last-mentioned, by Signor Mari, is ably scored, and is effective.

The ballad singing included the veteran Braham in "the old English Gentleman" and "Sods wha hae." Being encored in the former, he gave the "Bay of Biscay" at the general call; amidst tremendous cheering, indeed, it was demanded again, but the majority of the audience considered it misplaced, to save the Sexton's fingers the fatigue. Mr. Sims Reeves gave Moir's melody, "Believe me if all those endearing young charms," with great feeling, and was encored. The duo "Gallop on gaily," between Braham and Reeves, went off with much animation. In a selection from Donizetti's "Linda," Miss Lucombe distinguished herself as a brilliant vocalist. Mrs. A. Newton, Miss Wells, Miss Durlacher, and Miss Nelson afforded gratifying specimens of their vocal abilities. Lavenu and Rockstro were the accompanyists.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—We are pleased to learn that the subscriptions for the Ancient Concerts, of which there will be six this season, commencing on Monday, April 23, are progressing satisfactorily. The performance at Exeter Hall, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, of Beethoven's Mass in C, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, on Friday night, will be noticed in our next Number. Last Friday week the London Sacred Harmonic Society, conducted by Surman, performed Handel's "Samson." On Monday night, at the fourth meeting of the Choral Harmonists, Haydn's Mass, overture by Kalkbrenner, and one of Weber's Marches were performed. On Thursday, a concert was given at the Beaumont Literary Institution, Mile-end, at which Misses Birch, Mann, Madame I. Lablache, Signor F. Lablache, and Reeves were the singers. Mr. Barker has given a vocal and instrumental entertainment at the Hanover square rooms, entitled "Lays of the Foresters, or Songs of Robin Hood."—The concert given at the College Hall, Worcester, by Mdlle. Lind, in aid of the Infirmary, was brilliantly attended: Mdlle. Lind was enthusiastically received; she was aided by Charles Halle the pianist, F. Lablache, Belletti, &c. Two performances of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" took place this week, namely—Tuesday, at Manchester; Thursday, at Birmingham; and one to-night at Liverpool, the singers being Mdlle. Lind, the Misses A. and M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey and Mason, with Benedict as conductor. Next Monday will be a grand concert at Exeter Hall, at present unfixed, with Balfe as conductor.—On Tuesday Mr. Bennett begins his performances of Classical Piano-forte music, and on Wednesday will be the 13th Exeter Hall concert.

CONTINENTAL MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The London amateurs have reason to be proud of the state of music in their country. In every respect, whether as regards principals, chorus singers, or instrumentalists, there are now no performances to be heard on the Continent to be compared with those which may be listened to during a London season. To begin with the Grand Opera in the Rue Lepelletier. Another new tenor was essayed in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," and he signally failed, losing his voice before the opera was half over. But the misfortune of M. Espinasse I do not dwell upon; it may occur with the best regulated tenors in such a fatiguing part as that of Raoul, and as neither Duprez and Mario have been able to stand the wear and tear. It was in the general execution that the decay of French opera was visible, or rather a debâcle: such choral scrambling and orchestra braying have not assailed the drum and ear for many a day. Now, another tenor, M. Massol, formerly at the Opera Comique, is to be tried in Verdi's "Jerusalem." The ex-Académie Royale is on the eve of destruction, unless Meyerbeer's "Prophète" should prove a great hit, there will be a change in the direction. Every exertion is making to produce this long-promised opera, and it is considered certain that on the 6th of April, at the latest, it will be produced.

The new tenor at the Théâtre des Italiens has met with no decided success. Sanvisnvani, or Bartolini, as he is named in turn, . . . at from the Villa Conver- . . . and . . . . . Desdemona . . . . . week but . . . . . Rossini's "Semiramide," . . . . . and Moralli, Mamphis Albon, ... appear next Saturday in Nanita, in Rossini's "Gazza Ladra," transposed for her a tone lower, and Mdlle. Marie, the new operatic vocalist, will play the Pegpa. Madame Castellan reappeared in the "Elisir d' Amore" as Adina, with Ronconi as Dulcamara—quite a different reading from that of Labiache, but scarcely less diverting.

Accounts from Madrid are eulogistic of the singing of Mdlle. de Rolasy, late of the London Princess' Theatre, and of Signor Cuzzani, the tenor. We can only remark, that the Spanish amateurs are easily pleased: when the Madrid critics praise the dancing of Ponco and of M. Carey, they are better judges . . . . . The Grand Opera in Brussels, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, has changed its directorship. Masset, now one of the finest baritones in Europe, who was the manager, has retired, and has for successor M. Quellus, of the Théâtre Galeries St. Hubert, who begins on the 1st of May, the artistes carrying on the Opera in the interval with a company. The Brussels fashionables do not patronise the French Opera, which has really a very good orchestra, conducted by Hanssens, nephew of Charles Hanssens, now directing the band at the St. James's Theatre, in London, and an excellent chorus. The principals are very indifferent I heard Verdi's "Jerusalem" there the other night, with a very animated actress and singer, Mme Julian Van Gelder, who was formerly with the Brussels company. . . . . Mme Masset . . . . . upper notes, but there is no . . . . . praise the dancing of Fusco.

On the anniversary of the birth of Mozart (Jan. 27th) I heard, at the Königliche Schauspiele, Mozart's opera of "Die Hochzeit des Figaro" (Marriage of Figaro). The house was quite crowded. The opera was listened to with religious silence, and, truth to say, there was little to prevent the air from being breathed by Rhine amateurs. The work was rigidly and conscientiously executed; every note of the composer's score was done.

Whilst at Berlin I had the gratification to be present at Carlotta Grisi's benefit at the Royal Opera House, one of the most magnificent theatres in the world. She . . . . . "Giselle," and was rapturously . . . . . Mme Stephan for Lortzing's opera of "Czar and Zimmermann," and supporting Mme Taglioni in her popular ballet, also in full enjoyment and supporting the style of the Taglioni. The ballets are splendidly mounted in Berlin: that entitled Syracuse are admirably drilled, and the scenic accessories quite artistical.

THE THEATRES.

OLYMPIC.

On Monday evening the new classical drama by Mr. Oxenford, called "The Hemlock Draught," which was to have been brought out during the preceding week but for the serious illness of Mr. Leigh Murray, was produced, and with complete success; such as, indeed, it fully deserved. The piece is a translation of "La Ciguë," which some of our readers may remember to have seen at the French Plays some two or three seasons back; but the adaptation to our stage has been admirably effected. The dialogue is in polished blank verse, the original writing closely rendered, and, in some places, improved by a terse and pregnant general cast shown altogether in its production. The plot is as simple as the most classical lover of the "unities" could desire. Chrysis, a young Athenian (Mr. Leigh Murray), is regularly "raised up" in fact, he is the Sir Charles Cold-stream of Athens. Tired of a life of debauchery and of his two friends, Cleon (Mr. Kinloch) and Paris (Mr. Norton), the Sir Adonis Loveh and Hon. Tom Sausage of the same locality, he determines upon finishing his career. He sups the evening of the commencement of the drama with a cronch of hemlock. Just at this time a beautiful slave from Cyprus, Hippolais (Mrs. Stirling), is purchased for him, and he promises to leave his wealth to whichever of his two friends shall associates shall succeed in winning her affections. They swear eternal friendship to each other, quarrel violently, and both attempt to gain the prize. She rejects them, and by her mild behaviour wins first the admiration of the slave and then the love of Chrysis. He finds that there is still something worth living for. He abjures his dissolute life, casts off his parasitical friends, and marries the generous slave, as it turns out, Athenian girl, whose gentleness and sense succeed in making such an impression on him.

Mr. Leigh Murray played his character with nice perception; and it required delicate acting. He was ably seconded by Mrs. Sterling, who was seen to great advantage: her gentle bearing, and withal inborn pride of position, was admirably assumed.

After the drama, "Monsieur Jacques" was played, for the purpose of introducing Mr. B. Barnett in the principal character, formerly sustained with such great effect by his brother, Mr. Morton Barnett, who was also the original author of the piece. The same deep interest and sympathy—the same tears and smiles—which the latter gentleman so ably called up, bore testimony to the truthfulness of his brother's impersonation. He was applauded throughout, and called for at the end to receive at the conclusion.

In the "Illustrious Stranger," which followed, Mr. Compton, as Bonbill, in his nightcap and nightgown, was alone worth going to see. The house was quite full.

MARYLEBONE.

A very funny farce called "Isn't it a duck ?" was produced here last week, and kept the audience in a roar of laughter from beginning to end. The principal characters—that of an old London pastrycook, Marmaduke Macaroon, (Mr. G. Cooke); a fisherman, Simon Skate (Mr. Herbert); and Molly Maude (Miss Saunders), the daughter of Old Mack (Mr. Cooke), were admirably sustained; and the situations, being of very comical ultra-absurdity, ensured the success of the piece, which is in two acts. It was preceded by Mrs. Newett's play of "A Lesson for Life," in which some judicious alterations had been made, and which has evidently created the most favourable impression with the habitués of this, one of the most excellently managed theatres in London.

There is no truth in the report which appeared in several of our contemporaries last week, that Mrs. Nesbitt is about to become the lessee of the Strand Theatre.

Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzgibbon are playing at the Theatre Royal, Liverpool, with great success. The "Housekeeper" and "Box and Cox" have been performed; and in each of them Mr. Buckstone played the same character that he had the honour of representing before her Majesty and the Court at Windsor.

The pantomimes are dying out, one by one. Those at the Surrey, Olympic, and Marylebone are over, and Sadler's Wells concludes its run this week. They have mostly proved successful, and have benefited their respective treasuries.

Now that the Court theatricals are over, gossip on the subject is rife in the dramatic circles. Some surprise has been expressed that so eminent an actor as Mr. James Wallack was not amongst the company. It appears, however, that he was only desired the art of Assistant, with the very property declined wishing to play in some more important character of his own creating.

The Bath and Bristol amateurs are to pay fifty pounds each night for the use of the theatre and the stock company as they may be needed. This appears a large sum for any provincial house, first-class or otherwise.

THE WINDSOR THEATRICALS.—Her Majesty has presented to Mr. C. Kean, through the hands of the Hon. Colonel Phipps, a splendid diamond ring, and has announced the value of the gift by condescending to express to him in person her approbation of his professional exertions, as well as of the compliance with which he has attended his direction of the late Windsor Castle theatricals.

THE FINE ARTS COMMISSION.—The eighth report of the Commissioners on the Fine Arts, on Wednesday, following that from the office of the Parliamentary Papers. It appears that three frescoes have been painted for the House of Lords, in addition to the first executed by William Dyce, R.A. namely, "Religion," by John Cross, R.A.; "Spirit of Chivalry," by Daniel Maclise, R.A.; and "Edward the Black Prince receiving the Order of the Garter from Edward III.," by Charles West Cope, R.A. The commissioners consider the works which subsequently complete the series of frescoes for the Lords' chamber to which principles of frame painting . . . . . remain to be depicted, "Justice," and "Prince Henry, afterwards Henry V., ... of Chief Justice Gascoigne." The commissioners propose to commit the subject of "Justice" to D. Maclise, R.A., and the other to Charles West Cope, R.A. As considerable time will be required for the preparation of the cartoons, it may be found necessary to postpone the execution of the paintings till the next year. The commissioners are prepared to conclude an agreement with Mr. Dyce to decorate her Majesty's . . . . . with . . . . . the Baptism of Ethelbert, ... the Conversion of King Edwin, ... the Preaching of Paulinus, ... the Conversion of Sebert, ... the Landing of Augustine, ... the Baptism of King Ethelbert, ... the Baptism

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

NEW MEMBER.—Mr. H. WILLIAMS took the oaths and his seat for TYRO.

THE ADDRESS.—Mr LASCELLES, the Comptroller of the Royal Household, appeared at the bar, and stated that her Majesty had been pleased to return the following most gracious answer to the Address:—"I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address: and I rely with confidence on your co-operation with me in advancing the welfare and happiness of my people, whose interest it is my constant care to promote."

RANK OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PRELATES IN THE COLONIES.

Sir R. H INGLIS said that, in the course of the last session of Parliament, he had given notice that early in the present session he should ask for the production of a correspondence which had passed between the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland and Earl Grey, Secretary for the Colonies, respecting the rank of the Roman Catholic prelates in the colonies of Great Britain. The motion which he had now to call the attention of the House was, that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that copies of any correspondence which might have passed between the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland and Earl Grey, the Secretary for the Colonies, on that subject, should be laid on the table of that House. He conceived that, in consequence of a despatch of Lord Grey to the governors of colonies, undue precedence was given to Roman Catholic prelates there, particularly in the colony of New South Wales, where there was a Roman Catholic archbishop, while the Protestant prelate was but a Bishop. He considered that Lord Grey, in adopting the suggestion of Lord Cascendon, to give the titles of "Your Grace" and "Your Lordship" to Roman Catholic prelates, had outstripped his functions, and did what he scarcely believed the Queen herself could do.

Lord J. RUSSELL said there was no communication of the kind alluded to by the hon. gentleman to be found in the Colonial Office, and therefore, if the House agreed to the motion, the only answer that could be given from that office would be "no return." All that had occurred in the matter was that Lord Clarendon had written a private note to Lord Grey, stating that the Roman Catholics would feel much satisfaction if the same courtesy was exhibited in addressing their prelates in the colonies, as was the case in Ireland since the passing of the Emancipation Act, and that Lord Grey had subsequently communicated that suggestion to the governors of colonies in a circular despatch, but there had been no infringement of the act which forbade a Roman Catholic prelate to assume the title of a see to which a Protestant prelate belonged.

The motion was agreed to.

IRISH POOR-LAW COMMITTEE.—Sir WILLIAM SOMERVILLE moved that the Select Committee upon the Irish Poor-law do consist of twenty-one members, and that the following members be members of the said committee.—Lord John Russell, Sir James Graham, Sir John Young, Colonel Dunne, Mr. George Hamilton, Sir William Somerville, Mr. Scrope, Sir Robert Ferguson, Mr. Clements, Mr. Shafto Adair, Mr. Cornewal Lewis, Mr. Monsell, Sir Denham Norreys, Sir John Pakington, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Sharman Crawford, Mr. Fagan, Mr. O'Flaherty, Major Blackall, and Mr. Stafford. Agreed to.—Adjourned.

IRELAND.

FURTHER SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.

The following is the letter of Lord Clarendon to the Home Secretary, on which the proposition for the further suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland has been founded:—

"Dublin Castle, Jan. 26.

"Sir,—As the period is now approaching when the act 11 & 12 Vict., cap. 25, by which the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in this country, will expire, I feel it my duty to bring under the consideration of her Majesty's government the reasons which induce me to recommend the continuation of that law for a further limited period. It is with deep regret that on a former occasion I felt myself compelled to ask for the enactment of this measure, but circumstances have since fully confirmed my opinion of its urgent necessity, and I can have no doubt that the course then adopted by her Majesty's government, and the moral effect produced by the almost unanimous support which the bill received in Parliament, mainly contributed to the suppression of the rebellious movement which unhappily broke out in this country. While availing myself of the extraordinary power confided to me by the act, it has been my earnest endeavour to limit its operation as far as possible, and to confine the deprivation of personal liberty to the cases of those chiefs who were actually engaged in treasonable designs, or who, by encouraging the disaffected, endangered the peace and tranquillity of the country. No instance occurred of any arrest taking place except on sworn information; no person was retained in custody longer than the public safety appeared to require; and although the number of individuals who from time to time were kept in temporary confinement was considerable, having amounted at one time to 1,400, at different times to about 120, yet, considering the extent to which treasonable organisation had been carried, not only in the large towns, but in several counties of Ireland, the number can hardly be said to exceed what might have been anticipated. The security afforded by the enforcement of the powers and the confidence that its provisions would only be applied against those whose conduct had rendered their detention absolutely necessary, has had a effect on the community at large; and the restoration of order, in place of that which for a time was a reign of terror, has been hailed with very general satisfaction. But on the part of those engaged in the late treasonable movement, no indication whatever of sorrow or repentance for their misdeeds has been observed. Their rarrest is confined to their failure, and their desire is restricted to a more successful issue on the first favourable opportunity; nor is there any reason to doubt (and upon this point I have collected information from various persons on whose judgment and local knowledge I could rely) that their recent orderly conduct of the people in the districts where disturbances prevailed or were likely to occur proceeds from any improved feeling as regards the present law or the Executive Government. The total absence of support of the authorities in their endeavours to suppress insurrection, the renewed attempt at rebellion in the vicinity of the town where the leaders of the movement were first brought to justice, and the disregard of proclamations requiring the surrender of arms, are facts which indicate that, however the failure of past attempts at insurrection may have weakened the confidence of the disaffected, the feeling which gave rise to and encouraged that movement still remains unchanged, and would again become active upon any occasion that appeared to offer even a distant prospect of success. It is true that any future attempts at rebellion will be much discouraged by the failure of those which have passed, and the originators of any new agitation will have to surmount a great degree of success to aid, and much of the sense of past discomfiture to damp, their exertions; but still the country has been too long trained to a system of agitation to be at once weaned from such a course, and nothing but a continued enjoyment of that peace which the absence of all political excitement has now created, the improved habits it will generate, and the sensual advantages it will not fail to produce, can save Ireland from wasting her energies in the strife of rival factions, instead of exerting them by industry for the improvement of the country. It is to secure for Ireland this continued repose which is so vitally essential to her prosperity—to protect the country from the return of an agitation for objects that cannot be attained, and which for many years has disturbed its tranquillity, scaring away capital, destroying confidence, and rendering impossible the steady application of industry, that I desire strongly to impress on her Majesty's Government the importance of applying to Parliament for a renewal of those powers which the 11 & 12 Victoria, c. 25, placed at the disposal of the Executive Government in Ireland. I am aware of the grave responsibility I incur by this recommendation, and it is with the most repugnance that I venture to ask for the renewal of an act which infringes the constitutional rights of any portion of her Majesty's subjects, but I think I should fail in my duty if, from any personal feelings of my own, I hesitated to state the result which I know to be correct, or to recommend the course which I conscientiously believe to be necessary; and if her Majesty's government should see fit to propose, and Parliament to sanction, the renewal of this act, I trust that the manner in which it has hitherto been carried into effect will be an earnest that its future administration will be marked by leniency and justice.

"I am, sir, with great truth and regard, your obedient servant,

"The Right Hon. Sir George Grey, Bart., &c." "CLARENDON.

MR. DUFFY'S TRIAL.—The Attorney-General on Tuesday sent up a fiat in bill of indictment against Gavan Duffy! He may have to undergo a further trial before final judgment on the fourth bill, which he has now abandoned, against the prisoner, has caused in the legal world of the Irish metropolis some remarks not very favourable to Mr Monahan's professional dexterity. In the course of the day, true bills were found against Mr. Duffy.

PAID POOR-LAW GUARDIANS.—The system of stipendiary guardianship is undergoing modification. In several unions (one in Kilkenny, I believe, where there have recently been vice-guardians) the commissioners have decided that the Poor-law shall be administered by ordinary guardians.

DISTRESS IN THE WEST.—A Treasury minute of the 19th of January says: The Poor-law Commissioners report, that of the 131 unions into which Ireland is divided, 100 will not need extraneous assistance, 10 or 11 more may be rescued from embarrassment. There remain but 20 to be considered separately. A list is given of 2 unions, all along the west coast from Sligo to Bantry. The expenditure during the year was £598,000, of which £237,000 was sent from England; nevertheless the debt of these unions increased in the year by £48,000. The minute states the available potato crop of 1848 as less than that of 1847. Each individual relieved during the severe three-quarters of the year cost £1. The £367,900 furnished by British charity to Ireland stood on the lives of at least 200,000 people. The out-door relief, which in the week ending on the 6th of May, 1848, amounted to 83 millions, sunk in the last week of September to 30,000 millions. In the last week of November it was 71 millions. The number of inmates of workhouses was 130,000 in the beginning of June, 108,000 in the middle of September, and 163,000 at the end of November. From September, 1847, to September, 1848, there was spent on the poor of Ireland £1,586,000. Of this, £1,057,900 was raised in taxes

THE BUTLER DIVORCE CASE.—A decision has at length been given in the Butler divorce case, by the judges of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia. The decree was delivered by Judge King, the senior judge, and is in favour of Mrs. Butler. The document read by the judge is of great length, but the whole may be summed up in the following sentence: The Court decrees that it will not give any final decis on in relation to the divorce prayed by Pierce Butler against his wife, Frances Anne (Fanny Kemble) Butler, and that the matter shall and may be sent before a jury in the Court of Common Pleas, there to be tried and final issue given.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR FEBRUARY.

CŒUR DE LION. BY THE LATE JOHN STERLING.

The lion hearted was a Christian man,
And, therefore, loved the Saracens to throttle;
A born companion, too, and partisan
Of all whose watchword was "Sirloin and Bottle!"
And chose as comrade of his dish and can
No two-legged hook that wears hair and cobwebs mottle;
But firm he trod this earth so rich and real,
And only from its fields would reap the ideal.

Some men there are who share their hearts each morning,
Then split the hairs till everything is by one;
And some whose task is painting and adorning
Their own fine feelings, and have never done,
And some who only find a dreadful warning
In Nature's world of action, tears, and fun:
But Richard was a man of mirth and mettle,
Nor feared the flames required to boil his kettle.

LAST HOURS OF THE POET CAMPBELL.

On the 6th of June, 1844, he was able to converse more freely; but his strength had become more reduced, and on being assisted to change his posture, he fell back in the bed insensible. Convalescence was carried on in the room in whispers; and Campbell uttered a few sentences so unconnected that his friends were doubtful whether he was conscious or not of what was going on in his presence, and had recourse to an artifice to learn. One of them spoke of the poem of "Hohenlinden," and, pretending to forget the author's name, said, he had heard it was by a Mr. Robinson. Campbell saw the trick, was amused, and said cheerfully, but in a calm and distinct tone, "No; it was one Tom Campbell." The poet had—as far as a poet can become for years indifferent to posthumous fame. In 1838, five years before this time, he had been speaking to some friends in the shadow of the statue of "When I think of the existence which shall commence when the stone is laid above my head, how can literary fame appear to me—to any one—but as nothing. I believe, when I am gone, justice will be done to me in this way—that I was a pure writer. It is an inexpressible comfort, at my time of life, to be able to look back and feel that I have not written one line against religion or virtue." Bellicose feeling was, at the closing scene approached, more distinctly expressed. Beattie was thinking of the lines in "The Last Man," when he heard with delight the dying man express his belief "in life and immortality brought to light by the Saviour. To his niece he said, "Come, let us sing praises to Christ;" then, pointing to the bedside, he added, "Sit here." "Shall I pray for you?" she said. "Yes," he replied: "let me pray for each other." The Liturgy of the Church of England was read: he expressed himself "soothed—comforted." The next day, at a moment when he appeared to be sleeping heavily, his life suddenly ceased, and he said, "It shall be * * to-morrow," naming a long-departed friend. On the next day he expired without a struggle North British Review

THE NEW SUB-MARINE TELEGRAPH.

MR. MANAGER DOLPHIN.

Now Mr. Dolphin's appearance in the remote little Chatelet theatre may be accounted for in this manner. In spite of all his exertions, and the perpetual blazes of triumph, ornamentations of talent, vitcheries of good old English comedy, which his play-bills advertised, his theatre (which, if you please, and to injure no present susceptibilities and vested interests, we shall call the Museum Theatre) by no means prospered, and the famous Impresario found himself on the verge of ruin. The great Rubbard had acted legitimate drama for twenty nights, and failed to remunerate anybody but himself: the celebrated Mr. and Mrs. Cawdor had come out in Mr. Rawhead's tragedy, and in their favourite round of pieces, and had not attracted the public. Herr Garbage's lions and tigers had drawn for a little time, until one of the animals had bitten a piece out of the Herr's shoulder; when the Lord Chamberlain interfered, and put a stop to this species of performance; and the grand Lyrical Drama, blessed brought out with unexampled splendour and success, with Monsieur Pommeau as first tenor, and an enormous orchestra, had all-vor crushed poor Dolphin in its triumphant progress: so that, great as his genius and resources were, they seemed to be at an end. He was engaging on his own wretchedly, with half salaries, small operas, feeble old comedies, and bis ballet company; and everybody was looking out for the day when he should appear in the Gazette.—The History of Pendennis.

MR. JERICHO IN PARLIAMENT.

It was only too plain to Jericho's intimate friends that he was dying for his country. "Parliament is killing that man!" said the frequent cry of Mrs. Jericho. "He is wasting piecemeal," was the complaint of Mizzlemist. "All sin finds," cried Mrs. Jericho, the tears peeping from her eyes, "all his flesh goes into fifty blue books." And of this body it became a very popular superstition among the crowd of folks who visited the Man of Money. His blood and brain, eye the marrow of the senator, all was consumed to reappear in statistical form: yes, his very soul might be reconciled to the dreadful responsibility and imaginative, sacrificed to printer's ink. And—as Colonel Rosse would ask

"What cared the people of Toadsham for the devotion of their member?" Whilst Commissioner Thrush declared that to stick by his seat with the tenacity of Jericho, was not to sit leisurely and like a gentleman for a borough, but to be buried in the House. To be sure, Mrs. Jericho was again and again probed by sanguine friends that "Mr. Jericho must some day have a coronet." But the wife, loath to be comforted, would again fall upon her husband's daily waste. "A coronet! Yes; a coronet is all very well for him! But the dear fellow dwindles and dwindles in Parliament as he has done, why—poor creature—when the coronet comes, he'll have no head to put on it." An impossible case, of course; and may to be received as the morbid apprehension of conjugal affection.—A Man Made of Money.

PROGRESS OF SCIENCE.

The progress of scientific research in England and in Europe generally must not be judged of by the startling theories of amusing paradoxes which are occasionally put forward with the implied sanction of well-known names: as little ought we judge of the general education of English girls by D'Israeli's clever satire. "It is all development," says the fair drawing-room savante, referring to a well-known modern book; "I was a fish, and I shall be a acrow!" The answer seems to be, "Vaincat audant descendre d'un poisson que d'un singe."—Sharpe's London Magazine.

CON. CREGAN IN RAGS.

With a crown to spend, I was not going to descend to some subterranean den among coalheavers, newsvendors, and umbrella hawkers; but how was I to gain access to a better-class ordinary—that was the difficulty: who would admit the street-runner in the rags, into even a brief intimacy with his silver forks and spoons; and it was precisely to an entertainment on such a scale as a good tavern could supply that I aspired. As I reasoned thus, I passed various ordinaries, cropping with a kind of longing glance at each, to gaze at the luscious rounds of beef, so daintily tricked out with sprigs of parsley—the appetising cold sirloins, so beautifully stratified with fat and lean with hams that might tempt a Rabbi—but to speak of relishes provocative little paragraphs, about "Oxtail and Gravy ready at all hours." "[illegible] old it is," said I; "and there are passing at every instant, by ten and twenties, men and women, and children, flashing and waving money, who see all these things separated from them by a pane of window glass; and yet they only gather their heads together—kneel down their thin lips tighter, and move on. Not that alone; but here am I, with means to buy what I want—and yet I must not venture to cross that threshold, as though my rags should be an insult to their broad cloth." "Move on, youngster," quoth a policeman at this moment, and thus put an end to my soliloquy.—Con Cregan, the Irish Gil Blas.

THE WATCHMAN—BY LORD MAIDSTONE

In this world-wide Consternation, in the fall of States and Thrones—
Midst the clash of arms and thunder—turmoil, war, and angry passions;
While the "stars are falling" round thee, and the "sun and moon are blood!"
And the "sea and waves are roaring,"as they roar'd in Noah's flood!
Strong in self-confidence, surmoulé, in nothing scared,
With thy loins for action girded, oh, my country! watch prepared!

PENDENNIS IN LOVE

His uncle wanted him to travel, to quit the country for a while, and his mother urged him too: for he was growing very ill, and suffered severely. But he refused, and said point-blank he would not go. He would not obey in this instance: and his mother was too fond, and his uncle too wise to force him. Whenever Miss F[illegible] emerged, he rode over to the Chatelet Theatre and saw her. One night there were so few people in the house that the Manager returned the money. Pen came home and went to bed at eight o'clock, and he had a fever. If this continues, his mother will be going over and fetching the girl, the Major thought, in despair. As for Pen, he thought he should die. We are not going to describe his feelings, or give a dreary journal of his despair and passion. Have not other gentlemen been bulked in love besides Mr. Pen? Yes, indeed; but few die of the malady.—Pendennis.

SWALLOWING A WIFE

Mr Sergeant Davy, who has buried in Newington Church, Surrey, was a most eccentric character. He was originally a chemist and druggist, but left the latter's officer coming to serve on him a process from the Court of Common Pleas, he very civilly asked him to drink some liquor. While the man was drinking, Davy contrived to heat a poker, and then asking what the parchment process was made of, and being answered, of sheepskin; he told the officer it must eat as well as swallow, and recommended him to try it. The bailiff said it was his business to serve processes, and not to eat them; upon which Davy told him that if he would not eat that, he should swallow the poker! The man preferred the parchment; but the Court of Common Pleas, not then accustome to Mr. Davy's jokes sent for him to Westminster Hall, read him a serious lecture on contempt of their process, and locked him up in the Fleet Prison. From the circumstance, and some unfortunate men whom he met there, Davy acquired that taste for the law which the eating of a process had not given the bailiff; and when he was discharged from the Fleet, he applied to the study of the law in earnest, was called to the bar, made a sergeant, and was for a long time in considerable practice. He died in 1780.—London Anecdotes: Law and Lawyers.

SCENE THE LAST FROM SHAKSPEARE'S PLAY OF "KING JOHN," AT SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

The continued success of the Shakspearean revivals at this theatre must be gratifying to every lover of the English drama. Among the recent instances of this very commendable taste is the revival of Shakspeare's "King John," a play altered as little as possible from the original text; this being the first time it has been produced in London since it was brought out by Mr. Macready at Drury-Lane.

Mr. Phelps's performance of King John is a masterly piece of acting, in all the phases of the character; and Mr. G. Bennett, as Hubert, is very impressive. The Constance of Miss Glynn has also great intensity and power.

The getting-up of the play is entitled to the highest praise for the good taste and high intelligence evinced in every department. We have engraved the most effective scene—the death of King John, according to the play, in the grounds of Swinstead Abbey: the tableau was remarkably picturesque. The scene is cleverly painted by Mr. Fenton; though it is, in part, the artist's composition, there being no available representation extant of the Abbey.

THE SURREY THEATRE.

This now handsome theatre—one of the best in the metropolis in point of construction, both for sight and hearing—has come in for its full share of patronage during the holidays. A new drama, called the "Bivouac of the Hills," from which we have taken a scene for Illustration, was brought out last week, and with perfect success; although some unsparing curtailmen s still needed. There is nothing particularly novel in its plot or situations but great pains has been taken with the mise en scène, and it is very well acted: Mr. Emery, as Antoine Farouche, an old soldier of the Napoleon army, having an opportunity of giving us one of those rough melodramatic sketches which he can render so very effective; and being well played up to by Mr. Lyon and Mr. H. Widdicomb. The former gentleman is an old favourite; and the latter promises to be a low comedian of no ordinary excellence. He has, evidently, great original humour. We were also glad to see Mrs. Tellet here, about whom we expressed an opinion when she appeared at the Olympic.

Our Artist has selected the scene in which the hero (Mr. Lyon) returns to the cottage of the heroine (Miss Vincent), and reproaches her with inconstancy.

There has also been produced here a "dramatic romance," in two acts, entitled "A Night in the Tower," a condensed adaptation of Alexander Dumas' drama, "Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle," the principal character of which was written ten or eleven years ago for Mademoiselle Mars; and was produced at the St. James's Theatre three or four seasons back, under Mr. Mitchell's direction, when Mademoiselle Plessy, we think, played Gabrielle. It was also performed, under the late Mr. Hammond's management, at Drury-Lane, and called "A Night in the Bastile." The piece has always been as remarkable for its interest as for its questionable morale, so it is needless to say much about it, beyond that the scene is transferred to England, and the Rochelois of the French piece is the Rochester of this translation, gallantly played by Mr. Shepherd, and beautifully dressed, as indeed are all the characters. Madame Perini is a most valuable melodramatic actress; and Miss Lebatt sang an incidental song so well as narrowly to escape an encore.

Jenny Lind at Manchester.—Nothing could be more complete than the success of this lady on Tuesday evening at Manchester. The spacious Free-Trade Hall was crowded in every quarter, upwards of 3000 persons having been present. Mdlle. Lind sang the music allotted to the "widow," one of the smallest parts in the oratorio. In the choruses, the Lancashire chorus-singers even exceeded themselves, and the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Machin, received and deserved much approbation. Several encores were demanded and granted; and, at the conclusion, "God save the Queen" was sung by the principals, Jenny Lind taking the lead. The piece was re-produced on Thursday night at Birmingham.

General Theatrical Fund.—A meeting of the directors was held on Wednesday at the Lyceum Theatre. From the report of the directors, it appeared that since the last annual statement the invested capital had been increased from £4003 19s. 8d. to about £5000. In 1846, four members, of the respective ages of 67, 63, 59, and 58 years, were granted annuities of £26 per annum, and the directors had since been enabled to increase that allowance to £30. The institution exists not alone for the benefit of those who had fixed London engagements in one particular theatre, but for that of performers (including pantomimists, dancers, chorus-singers, and prompters) in every theatre over the country.

AGED YEW-TREE IN DARLEY CHURCH-YARD.

Throwing its guardian shade upon the picturesque church of the village of Darley, about midway between Matlock and Chatsworth, and nearly in the centre of Derbyshire, stands this venerable Yew, stated to have existed six hundred years, and to be the finest and oldest in the county. It is thus noticed in Gisborne's "Reflections:"—

> Nor shall thy reverend Yew, the sire who holds
> His sceptre verdant through the changeful year,
> Unnoticed stand! He has beheld a
> Thousands ontomb'd within his shadow; heard,
> For ages past, the sobs, the far-fetch'd groans,
> Of parting anguish ere the grave was closed,
> And drank the mourner's tears!

An obliging correspondent, who has sketched this fine old tree, informs us that he measured round the trunk, which is 33 feet in circumference.

AGED YEW-TREE IN DARLEY CHURCH-YARD, DERBYSHIRE.

"The tree is evidently decaying. A person residing close to the church-yard informed me that 30 or 40 years ago the branches extended to the church-yard wall, so that boys could get into the branches from the top of the wall, and completely cross the church-yard on to the roof of the church, on the opposite side, without descending to the ground. The church contains nothing remarkable, but is a very picturesque-looking object on the road from Derby to Buxton and Manchester. Persons travelling by coach do not now get a view of it, as formerly; the road which formerly passed close to the chancel window being now disused, and a new road made to the right, so that it can only be seen at about a quarter of a mile distance."

The age of the Darley Yew is, however, exceeded by that of several other specimens in England. The yew-trees at present existing at Fountain's Abbey, Yorkshire, are supposed to have attained their full growth when the Abbey was erected, in 1132. The Tytherley, Fortingal, Harlington, and Loch Lomond yews are remarkable for their size and age. Many of them, if we estimate them in the mode proposed by De Candolle, must exceed considerably a thousand years.

The origin of planting the yew in church-yards is not at all clearly made out. Their dark foliage and supposed deadly shade may have pointed them out as the fit emblems of silence and death.

Mr. Bowman (Mag. of Nat. Hist., vol. i) observes, that "it seems most natural and most simple to believe, that being indisputably indigenous, and being, from its perennial verdure, its longevity, and the durability of its wood, at once an emblem and a specimen of immortality, its branches would be employed by our Pagan ancestors, on their first arrival here, as the best substitute for the cypress, to deck the graves of the dead, and for other sacred purposes."

ST. LUKE DRAWING THE VIRGIN AND CHILD.—FROM A PICTURE BY JOHN VAN EYCK.

PAINTING BY VAN EYCK.

HIS fine picture has recently been imported into this country by Mr. Artaria, and must be considered as a very valuable and interesting accession to our art-treasures. It is a first-class work of John Van Eyck, who, though he did not discover the art of painting in oil (as was long believed), greatly improved the art, and brought it into general use. This was effected by his discovering the means of giving consistence to colours without drying them in the sun, and of adding to them clearness and brilliancy by a water-proof varnish. The picture before us is a brilliant specimen of this excellence, and powerfully exhibits the master's great skill as a colourist, together with his great variety of expressive design.

We find the following high character of this Picture in a late Number of the Athenæum:—

"St. Luke (in whom is to be recognised the portrait of the donatore) is represented in the act of drawing in grisaille the Virgin and Child. The holy personages are under a canopy of rich cloth of gold, the Virgin seated on a carved Gothic throne. The interior in which the action takes place is divided from a middle distance by a Gothic door-way or opening; over which, and at whose sides, glass stained with armorial bearings and other devices make allusion, probably, to the donor or individual through whose instrumentality the picture was called into existence. On a terrace in the mid-distance, a man and woman, habited in the quaint costume of the time, are engaged in conversation, looking out on a river stirred by the breeze, and flanked by buildings, and on a street in which are gossips at shop-doors and loungers in the street. A landscape distance bounds the horizon. In all the details of these several parts, the truth and beauty of execution are not more remarkable than is the astonishing state of preservation after the lapse of four centuries. It is the habit to talk of the Venetian scorci: admiration would be more fittingly bestowed on combinations of which they were masters alike in their arrangement of local colours and in the excessive delicacy and subtlety of their tints. But if mystery is to be assigned to the characteristics of any school, it is to that of Van Eyck and his followers that such an attribution should most properly be made. Luminousness is commonly associated with the proper management of impasto—transparency with systematic conduct of the ground, left more or less as the basis of the shadows. The one and the other are alike attained in this picture, by means which all the advantages of modern discoveries in chemistry, and all the refinements of modern practice do not realize. It will be, of course, understood that these remarks are intended to be restricted to the technology of materials. In an archaic sense this work is of high importance to the painter; but such forms as these of the Virgin and the Infant Christ assort not with the ideal of those who can appreciate what is beautiful and refined in Nature, or what is abstract and grand in Art. In the manifestation of completeness of means, and as dealing with great variety of incidents and details, this will challenge comparison with the picture by the same master which our National Gallery already possesses, and in many senses Mr. Artaria's picture will be thought preferable."

HIGHTON'S ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS.

ON Wednesday last, Mr. Edward Highton, C.E., read before a crowded meeting of the Society of Arts the second part of his paper on Improvements in Electric Telegraphs. The paper was one of peculiar interest, as it not only gave descriptions of the latest improvements in the instruments themselves, but it contained also an account of various actions of lightning and the aurora borealis on Electrical Telegraphs generally. The paper was illustrated by a number of beautiful experiments.

In the lower model room were to be seen a number of Telegraph Instruments, the inventions of Messrs. H. and E. Highton. One large table was filled with Printing Telegraphs, some of which were in operation at the time; and another table contained no less than seven different kinds of Telegraphs, where messages are sent either by the letters themselves being presented to the eye of the distant observer, or a hand or dial made to revolve and to point to the letters desired: in other instruments the messages are read off by the movements of pointers or screens. The simplicity and beautiful workmanship displayed in the instruments excited the admiration of all.

In order to make our readers acquainted with some of the Telegraphs invented by Messrs. Highton, and exhibited to the meeting, we proceed to give a brief description of one or two of the instruments.

There are at least a dozen new and improved methods of carrying on telegraphic communication by means of electricity. In some plans the messages are read off by conventional signals, as in the plans of Messrs. Wheatstone and Cooke; in others the printed letters are presented to the eye; and in others the messages are printed either in symbolical characters or in the letters of the English alphabet.

FIG. I.

HIGHTON'S ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

As there were no less than two large tables filled with the telegraph instruments and inventions of these gentlemen instruments some of which are based on the most scientific principles, it will be evident to all that it will be impossible for us, in the limits allowed for our description, to do anything like justice to the inventors. We must, therefore, give now a brief description of only one or two of the first class of Telegraphs, but must omit the description of the Printing Telegraphs.

One of the great improvements of Messrs. Highton consists in the substitution of a magnet in the shape of a horseshoe for the magnetic needle used by Professor Wheatstone. By this means, the necessity of the wire of the coil passing over the dead part of the magnet is avoided, and the coil of the instrument is reduced from 6½ inches to 1½ inch in length, and one-seventh only of the electricity required to work the telegraph.

The letters on the dial are so arranged, that those which occur most frequently in the English language require the least manipulation, so that thirty per cent. in time is consequently saved in sending a message. This property seems to have been hitherto wholly neglected in all previous telegraphs

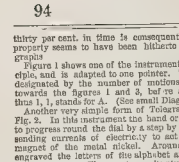
Figure 1 shows one of the instruments on this principle, and is adapted to one pointer. The letters are designated by the number of motions of the pointer towards the figures 1 and 3, half-a-a slight pause, thus 1, 1, stands for A. (See small Diagram, A B C D.)

Another very simple form of Telegraph is shown by Fig. 2. In this instrument one hand or pointer is made to progress round the dial by a step by step motion, by sending currents of electricity to act on an electro-magnet of the metal nickel. Around the dial are engraved the letters of the alphabet and other words and sentences. The great peculiarity in this instrument consists in the escapement emp-oyed to govern the motion of the pointer. It is perfectly new and totally different from any escapements hitherto used, and it is so made that by sending a current of electricity, the pointer, wherever it may be on the dial, can instantly be made to progress by a single bound to zero or the starting-point. By this arrangement any insertion of one telegraph instrument in a set es is prevented from entailing subsequent errors, and the time of transmitting a message is also reduced to one-half; for, suppose it were necessary to designate the letter A after pointing to B, then the pointer would, at one bound, be made to jump round to the starting-point, and a single step movement would bring it to A.



The next form of Telegraph is one of the most beautiful and simple contrivances ever made use of for affecting the object desired. In this instrument (Fig. 3) the desired letters are instantly brought into view by merely touching the keys corresponding with such letters. The way this is accomplished is by having a long aperture in the dial or face of the instrument, and placing behind it three moveable screens (Nos. 1, 2, 3). At the back the screen No. 3 is placed, with the letters of the alphabet printed on it. Before this is placed screen No. 2, having apertures as shown in the Engraving. And in front, and immediately behind the orifice in the dial, is placed screen No. 1. These three screens are suspended on centres, and are attached to magnets, which are caused to move to the right or left by currents of electricity sent along the line wires. It is, consequently, obvious that as each screen can remain at rest or be thrown to the right hand or the left, the three screens can be made to assume any one of twenty-seven relatively different positions, and, consequently, made to view any one of twenty-seven different letters. These screens, then, being made to correspond with the keys, every time a key is pressed down, the corresponding letter is instantly shown, and that by means of only three line wires. No one has ever previously attempted to accomplish this with less than twenty-six wires. This form of Telegraph is so simple, that any person who has seen a Telegraph before can instantly either send or receive a message.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

It is now reasonable to conclude, that, from the close of the racing season of 1848 to the commencement of that of 1849, the regular routine of the training stable will not have been interrupted for 24 hours. This fact alone would ensure to the Spring Meetings an unparalleled strength in horses; but, coupled with the influence it will have in bringing forward backers, the turf campaign will open with an éclat and spirit that it has not heretofore known. Silent as are the echoes of Doncaster as to the prospects of the great Three Year-Old Stakes at Newmarket, they are unusually rich in materials and interest. Presently they will be heard of; but for the moment the handicaps engross all speculation. The acceptances for these "sporting" events are very considerable—viz. 108 for the Chester Cup; 63 for the Metropolitan Handicap; 92 for the Newmarket Handicap; 43 for the Northumberland Stakes, and 92 for the Somersetshire Stakes. That they have not given general satisfaction, is to be expected; but that the especial event of the "metropolis" should have given umbrage to its especial promoter, may draw upon it the "blood and thunder thing." A good deal has been said about the unfairness of approximating high weights to "maiden" horses: but the argument has two sides; and they who insist that, because a four-year old has never done anything, it must necessarily be bad, should bear in mind, that animals entered for great races, ipso facto, put forth claim to racing qualities. The betting is not so animated as the occasion would seem to call for; its character is, of course, affected by the lottery system. It is now good times with the book-makers, and they are not the people to neglect opportunity.

On Tuesday the Brocklesby Hunt Steeple-Chase comes off, as also the Carmarthenshire, and on Wednesday the three Stock races of that ilk. Whatever the farmers may think of the weather, for the sports of the field it is about as near perfection as the heart of man can desire. During the present month the country has ridden well everywhere, and the diary of the fox-hunter has repeated this singular record "Bright sunshine and a burning scent." The coursing meetings between the 12th and the 16th of the present month include those of the Border Club, at Kelso, on Tuesday and the following day; Cardington (Bedfordshire) Champion Meeting, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday; Revel (Warwickshire), Wednesday; Holland Spring Champion Meeting, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; and the Aston Club, on Thursday and Friday.

The reference to the Liverpool Steeple-chase, which is to come off on Friday, calls to mind the fine chance which Jerry Hall's horse Ambush II. offers them on the success of the rising 25 sovereigns towards his overthrow, will, they to take their stand in the Liverpool betting ring, among that dashing sporting fixture within a score of miles of Alma Mater.

On Monday week the racing season will open with the "Pembrokeshire Races"—a slight bona fide concession to the Principality event. Then follows the Liverpool Spring, and its steeple-chase that has so justly won the title of "Grand National," for it is surely without a compeer, here or elsewhere. The acceptances for this much envied race are to be declared on or before the 19th of February, so that on Monday it will cast its sporting shadows before.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Since Monday, the English Funds have advanced one-and-a-quarter per cent., with an apparent tendency to further improvement. This is principally attributable to the amount of unemployed capital which continues to be rejected by the leading discount houses, at any price, while, at the Stock Exchange, one per cent. can with difficulty be procured on Monday at 9 1/2 for money and time, closing without a fluctuation during the day. The tranquillising Lecture of the Paris advices on Tuesday, notwithstanding several large sales of stock for money to the Provinces, gave an improvement of ¼ per cent., which was followed on Wednesday by another advance of ¾ per cent., Consols quoting 92¾ ⅞, closing firmly. These prices were quoted for the opening on Thursday, but afterwards contracted to 92¾ ¾ was attained; without a slight reaction left the price one quarter per cent. lower. The unfunded debt has not advanced with equal rapidity; nor have Bank or India Stock been in active demand. India Bonds appear to be the favourite with the public, but little business, the market was firm, at the following quotations:—Bank Stock, 196 ; 4 per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 99¾ ; New 3½ Cents, India Annuities, 99¾ ; New 3½ per Cent Annuities, 98¾ ; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 1860, 9 1-16; Ditto, October 10, 1859, 8 13-16 ; Ditto, 30 years, Jan. 5, 1860, 8 11-16; India Stock, 261 ; India Bonds, £1000, after 1860, 9 ; Consols for Account, 92⅝ ; Exchequer Bills, £1000, March, 45 pm ; £1000, June, 30 pm ; Small, March, 45 pm ; Small, June, 49 pm

Foreign securities have been taken in the animation of the English Funds, and generally mark an advance. Russian Stock quotes an improvement of two per cent, and Spanish Five per Cents have been largely dealt in for speculative purposes This new demand arises from the result of a meeting of the Spanish Bondholders held on Tuesday. It was then resolved, that, in the absence of our diplomatic relations with the Spanish Government, the Netherlands delegates should be empowered to represent the English Bondholders. A letter from Narvaez to the committee was read by Mr. Capel, in which he promises to "do all within the sphere of his influence" to promote an early settlement of their claims. Upon this, Spanish Five per Cents advanced to 16, and the Three per Cents to 29¾. Mexican has not been largely dealt in; and Portuguese is now quoted without the Coupon. The market, at the close of the week, was tolerably buoyant, at the following prices:—Brazilian, 80; Grenada Bonds, 1 per Cent., 1¼ ; Ditto, ex over-due Coupons, 5⅛; Mexican, 5 per Cent., 18¾, 19⅛; Portuguese, 4 per Cent., 39¾ ⅝ ; Russian Bonds, 106 ; Spanish, 5 per Cent., 1840, 16⅞ ; Ditto, Account, 17⅛ ; Ditto, Coupons, 10 ; Ditto, Passive, 4⅛ ; Ditto, 3 per Cent., 29⅛ ; Belgian 4½ per Cent., 79⅛ ; Dutch 2½ per Cent., Account, 50 ; Ditto, 5 per Cent. Certificates, 72

Shares are again gradually regaining public favour, and good purchases on behalf of private investors are being daily made. Great Westerns have been done at 105 , and Northern and Eastern at 20 . North Staffordshire have not made any great advance upon the result of the meeting, the present traffic being very low. The attention of the public is now directed to the coming meetings; and it must be hoped that shareholders will attend and carefully check any tendency to increased outlay on leasings or amalgamations, which the present state of the Money Market may possibly tempt directors to propose. Business done firmly in the Railway Share Market, with a gradually advance, buyers in numberless instances only awaiting the signal for closing the capital accounts. The last prices of certain bargains are—For Railways, Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 4¾ ; Caledonian, 24½ ; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 4⅛ ; Ditto, New, £10 Preference, 8¼ ; Chester and Holyhead, 22¾ ⅛ ; Dublin and Belfast Junction, 5⅛ ; Eastern Counties, 11⅛ ; Ditto, New Guaranteed Six per Cent., 11⅝ ; Eastern Union, Class A, Scrip, Six per Cent., 19, East Lancashire, 20 ; Ditto, New, Quarters, 4¼ ; Ditto, Six per Cent., Preference, Quarters, 7 ; East Lincolnshire, 37⅞ ; Great Northern, 94 ; Ditto, Half, Class A, Deferred, 5 ; Ditto, Half, Class B, Six per Cent. LIGHT IMPORTATIONS.—A return just published gives the following as the amount of bread stuffs imported into Dublin on the 1st of February:—17,730 quarters, 1000 barrels, 2318 sacks of wheat; 1235 sacks, 1763 barrels of flour; 4268 sacks of Indian corn; 1426 quarters of barley; 150 barrels of bread; 41 [illegible] Taken out of store—22,706 quarters wheat, 4167 sacks, 3572 cwts. of flour, 3543 quarters, 1930 barrels of barley. Notwithstanding this formidable array of figures, there was a firm demand for all descriptions of grain at the Corn Exchange to-day; wheat at an improvement of 6d. to 1s., and oats at 3d. to 6d. Barley supported the currency of Tuesday.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of English wheat up to our market this week have been again extremely small, and of middling quality Fine dry samples have produced a trifle more money. In other kinds only a moderate business has been transacted, at late rates Foreign wheat has sold to a fair extent, at to per quarter advance. Malting barley must be considered quite as dear. Grinding and distilling sorts have commanded very little attention The supply of malt having considerably exceeded the wants of the buyers, the trade has ruled dull, and barely stationary prices. Good second malt have advanced 6d to 1s per quarter. In beans next to nothing doing, on somewhat easier terms. Peas, Indian corn, and meal have ruled very little attention

CHRIST CHURCH, BATTERSEA, SURREY.

The want of church accommodation being much felt in this populous suburban parish, the then Hon. and Rev. Vicar (now the Right Hon. and Right Rev. Lord Auckland, Bishop of Sodor and Man), in the year 1846, commenced obtaining subscriptions for the purpose of building a new church; and a committee of gentlemen was formed, to whom, and to their Honorary Secretary, William Lawrence, Esq., much credit is due in seconding the Vicar's exertions.

In September of the same year plans for a new church were requested by the committee from six architects, four of whom sent in designs; when, after careful investigation, those received from Mr. Charles Lee, of No. 20, Golden-square, London (who had associated with him therein Mr. Thomas F. Bury), were chosen and adopted; and the first stone of the building was laid, May 27th, 1847, by the Lord Bishop of Sodor and Man, in the presence of more than 2000 of the inhabitants.

This new church is in appearance highly picturesque and characteristic; it is in the English decorated, or middle-pointed style of architecture, faced with Kentish rag-stone; the dressings and finishings are of Bath stone; and the spire is wholly built of Kentish rag and Bath stone.

In plan this edifice is cruciform, with nave, aisles, and chancel; also a chapel on the north side of the chancel for the children, and an entrance porch attached to the south nave aisle. There are galleries only in the transepts; the whole of the remaining space is, therefore, left uninterrupted; and the organ being placed on the north side, in the tower, the beautifully enriched west window is seen without any obstruction from the interior of the building.

This church is built to accommodate 900 persons, at a cost of £3500 (the builders' estimate), which sum has been entirely raised by the voluntary subscriptions of the inhabitants, some of whom have given most liberally; thus presenting a good example to other and more wealthy parishes in want of church accommodation.

The ground for the church, and for an attached burial-ground, was given by the Vicar and Patron of the living, the Right Honourable the Earl Spencer, who is also the Lord of the Manor. The builders are Messrs. Wiuland and Holland, of Duke-street, Bloomsbury. The church is completed externally.

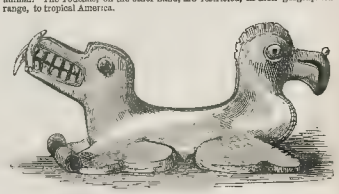
A Thirsty "Infant."—In a case heard at the Stamford County Court, last week, the plaintiff, a tailor and publican, sued the defendant for 9s. 11½d. for beer and spirits supplied. The Judge having learned that the defendant was only 18 years of age, said he might have appeared and pleaded "infancy," but as he had not done so he would hear the case. His Honor then told the plaintiff to read the items, which he did, giving the following as the amount of one day's chalking up:—"Five half-pints of ale, three glasses of gin and water, and three glasses of brandy."—Judge: "And you supplied this in one day to this infant?"—Plaintiff (astounded): "Infant! why they say he is 18 years old. Infant!"—Judge: "Go on."—Plaintiff: "September 29, ale 3d., ditto 3d., gin 3d., a loaf of bread for his man when he went out shooting," &c.—Judge: "What?"—Plaintiff: "He has a dog and a gun, a game certificate, and he keeps a horse to go out a-hunting; and he sometimes treats his friends."—Judge: "What is he, then?" Plaintiff: "The son of a pawnbroker."—Judge "Well, he is but an 'infant' in the eye of the law. I shall disallow from the account the charge for spirits, and I shall make an order that the balance be paid when the 'infant' comes of age—in three years' time."—The plaintiff seemed puzzled with the size and capacity for drink of the law's "infants."—Lancashire Chronicle.

CURIOUS GOLD MEMORIAL.

This curious ornament, of pure virgin gold, was found in the grave of a Chief in the province of Antioquia, in New Grenada, South America. It will be seen to bear two heads, one somewhat resembling that of a hippopotamus, and the other that of a bird, approaching the peculiar conformation of the toucan, as regards the bill. The base of the ornament is of foot-like form; one end having a rude resemblance of claws. The base measures about four inches by three and the height of the whole is about three inches.

There is room for speculation as to the design of this exhumed treasure; more especially as the hippopotamus, which one of the forms resembles, is an African animal. The Toucans, on the other hand, are restricted, in their geographical range, to tropical America.



GOLD MEMORIAL FOUND IN A CHIEF'S GRAVE, IN NEW GRENADA.

With the above was found the figure, apparently, of a warrior, affixed to a circular plate, both of gold.

GEORGE NEAL.

The chequered muster-roll of eccentric character has received many accessions from the twin services, the Army and Navy; but few of them possess greater abundance of incident than the protracted career of the "worthy" who is figured at full-length in the present column. He shuffled out of the world last summer, at Coventry, and was there buried with military honours, a few of the 11th Hussars and the 87th Regiment furnishing the firing party. Although interred with such "pomp and circumstance," the old fellow, George Neal, had nearly slipped into oblivion, perhaps, put out by the Revolution of June. A kind hand has, however, saved his memory from this doom. His life is, indeed, a "mingled yarn;" for he had served in both hemispheres, and in both services, Navy and Army, under some of the most distinguished commanders of his day; had his leg broken by a round shot, and his skull fractured, besides receiving a number of other wounds; and he had received, moreover, corporal punishment to the amount of 3000 or 4000 lashes.

Few have passed through a more varied career. Born of very poor parents at Coventry, a part of Neal's youth was passed in the workhouse: he was successively apprentice to a pauuer, in Birmingham; butcher's boy, at Coventry; and postboy at the King's Head Inn, in that town. He went to sea at the age of 18. He was present on board the Formidable, flag-ship of Admiral Rodney, in the memorable action with the French fleet under Count de Grasse, in April, 1782; and on that occasion his leg was broken. He was discharged the following year. A few years after, he enlisted into an independent company, commanded by Captain Roden, from which he was transferred to the 77th Regiment, and went to India, where he served in it under Generals Harris and Nicolls, and Colonel Wellesley, now Duke of Wellington. He was at the storming of Bangalore, in 1791; and at the taking of Colombo, in 1796. At the storming of Seringapatam, in 1797, he was one of the forlorn hope under Sergeant Graham, who was killed after he had planted the English colours on the rampart. George Neal received several wounds on this occasion. He was discharged with a pension in 1809.

Neal had been for some years one of the eccentrics of the ancient city of Coventry. The old man's death was accelerated by an attempt he made to walk from Birmingham to Coventry. He had been to the former place to make enquiries as to his son, whom he had lost sight of for some years. After walking seven miles, he became quite exhausted, and was brought back to Coventry, where he died not many days afterwards. The sketch whence the accompanying Engraving has been copied, was taken last March. There is some doubt as to his precise age; the records of his services show him to have been near 90 years of age, though common report stated him at 93.

Controverted Elections.—The Speaker of the House of Commons has appointed the following members to constitute the General Committee of Elections for the present session:—Mr. Fox Maule, Sir George Clerk, Mr. John Wilson Patten, Sir Robert Alexander Ferguson, Mr. T. Duncuft, and Sir John Buller Yarde Buller.

Cape of Good Hope.—The Lords of the Treasury have caused Mr. Parker, one of their Lordships' secretaries, to transmit to the Commissioners of the Customs a copy of an Order in Council, directing a duty of 2s. per gallon to be charged upon spirits imported into the Cape of Good Hope, and to permit the delivery, duty free, of one gallon of spirits for every ten gallons of Cape wine exported, or deposited in the warehouse for exportation.

ROAD REFORM.

Mr. Cornewall Lewis has obtained leave to bring in a Bill for the Consolidation and Amendment of the Laws relating to Public Roads in England and North Wales. The subject is one of very great importance, and has been forced upon the attention of the Legislature by the revolution in the old modes of transit produced by railways. The coach roads of England are admirably constructed; but the gradual completion of all the great lines of railway, and of their tributary feeders, by removing the traffic from these old highways of our ancestors, has deprived them of the funds necessary for their maintenance and repair. Many of the turnpike trusts have declared themselves insolvent; and in some cases the mortgagees and bondholders have endeavoured to supersede the trustees, and to collect the few remaining tolls on their own account. Litigation has ensued, and further debt and liability have been incurred both by the trustees and by the bondholders. In other instances the parishes through which the roads pass have been applied to for rates in aid. Generally, the affairs of these partly superseded, but still necessary modes of internal communication, have become so unsatisfactory as to demand immediate attention and remedy, both in the interest of the public who still continue to use them, and of the individuals who have advanced their money to construct and to maintain them. A measure was introduced last session by the Government, by which it was proposed to deal with the highways exclusive of the turnpike trusts; but, after being referred to a committee, it dropped;—partly, we believe, in consequence of the waste of time produced by the long speechification of honourable members, until the near approach of the grouse season; and partly on account of the objection raised to it, as not comprehensive enough.

The Government, by the measure of Mr. Cornewall Lewis, attempts to deal with the whole subject of the coach roads of the kingdom, including both turnpike roads, and highways, properly so called. It appears from Mr. Lewis's interesting statement on introducing the bill, that the number of places in England and North Wales at present repairing their own roads amounts to 18,000; and that the length of road is, in round numbers, about 100,000 miles. The annual expense incurred for the maintenance of the highways is £1,400,000; the turnpike trusts, of which there are 1150, is £1,378,000: forming a total of £2,778,000. The debt incurred by the trusts amounts to upwards of £8,000,000, the interest of which sum has to be provided for by means of the tolls. These figures show the magnitude as well as complexity of the interests involved. The Ministerial measure—for such we must presume the bill of Mr. Lewis to be—proposes to abolish all parochial liability for the maintenance of roads; to abolish, at the same time, the powers of the various road trustees throughout the kingdom; and to take the counties as the areas both of taxation and management. It is proposed to place the local control of the roads in a committee of the Quarter Sessions, to be elected by the magistrates, and to be called the "County Road Board." This body is to have a general control, and to be empowered, subject to the general regulations of the bill, to collect tolls on the main roads, and to maintain the branch roads by means of the county assessment. It is proposed to vest the local management in the Poor-law Unions; and that, on the 25th of March, 1850, all turnpike and highway jurisdiction at present existing shall be superseded by the new machinery. With regard to the debt of £8,000,000, and upwards, the measure proposes that it shall be imposed upon the counties; and that a fund shall be set apart from the general amount receivable from the tolls and from the county rates, for the discharge of the debt in a period not less than seven, nor above twenty-one years.

Such are the main provisions of a bill which, at all events, has the merit of comprehensiveness. It will, no doubt, be fully discussed in its various stages through the House. Opinions adverse to some of its details have already been expressed. Doubts are entertained of the justice of burdening the counties with the debts of improvident trustees, who have mismanaged their resources, and incurred needless and wasteful expenditure. It is also matter for serious consideration whether the Poor-law Unions have not so much to do in the management of the poor, in the support and education of pauper children, and in the repression of vagrancy, as to leave no leisure for the proper superintendence of the highways and byways of the kingdom. Perhaps in the discussion that the measure will provoke, some suggestions will be thrown out for introducing a principle of fairness in the distribution of the debt, so that wasteful and dishonest trustees may not be relieved quite as easily from their liabilities as those who have not been guilty of extravagance and mismanagement. Perhaps, also, it will be possible to adopt the machinery of the Poor-law Unions for the surveillance and management of the roads, without placing too great a burden upon the shoulders of the Poor-law Guardians.

Our own opinion is strongly in favour of that principle of the new measure which supersedes the road trustees. Neither railroads nor coach-roads should be the property of individuals. The "Queen's highway" is a common phrase; but in fact our highways and byways, instead of being as they ought to be, the property of the State, are the property to a great extent of private persons, who think more of their own interest than of the interest of the public. It is too late to repair the error in the matter of railways; but the very existence of railways, which has caused the partial abandonment, and consequent depreciation of property, in the old coach roads, offers an opportunity of repairing the error in the case of the last-mentioned, which we are glad to see has not been lost sight of.

Without venturing the opinion that Mr. Lewis's bill is not of a character calculated to satisfy, better than any other project that could be devised, the various interests involved in the question, we would throw out for his consideration the suggestions of Mr Pagan in his valuable pamphlet upon "Road Reform," published two or three years ago. Tolls have hitherto been considered necessary evils; but there are not wanting persons—and we must own ourselves to be of the number—who consider them to be very unnecessary evils; and who think that the establishment of turnpikes and toll-gates is a cumbrous, barbarous, and most extravagant method of raising a revenue. Mr. Pagan proposes their abolition.

Every traveller knows the obstruction and the nuisance of tolls. To be stopped every now and then by an official, holding out his hand for your money, is a serious drawback to the enjoyment of a ride either on horseback or in a carriage. At night, when no person travels unless upon urgent business, the nuisance of delay is still greater. However pressing the necessity for haste, the traveller is impeded by the "inexorable bar" of the turnpike-man, who—caring nothing for possible, but improbable travellers—retires to bed, and has to be aroused from his slumbers to receive his tax before the impatient wayfarer can be allowed to proceed. Life and death are of no account to the man of tolls. But this is only a portion of the evil. The money thus received, instead of being expended upon the maintenance of the road, is liable to a large percentage for the building and maintenance of the toll-house, and for the support of the turnpike-man and his family. We should be glad if Mr. Lewis, or any other member of Parliament, would procure a calculation of the number of toll-houses erected on, and of turnpike-men employed in, the 1150 turnpike trusts of England and Wales, and of the annual cost of both. We think it would be found to amount to a very serious sum out of the £2,778,000 which our highways entail upon us. Mr. Pagan's plan provides for the immediate abolition of all these toll-houses, and the consequent disbanding of this large, vexatious, and unproductive army of toll-collectors, by the substitution of an annual tax upon horses for the toll due.

The two great merits of the change are obvious—perfect freedom for travellers, and the expenditure of the whole amount of the taxation for the purposes for which it is levied. It would not, perhaps, be just that the owners of horses and carriages should pay the whole amount of taxation necessary for the support of the roads; but it seems to us that between a road-tax upon horses and vehicles, receivable in the same manner as the assessed taxes, and a county rate, the whole amount might be levied with perfect fairness, convenience, and efficiency. It is calculated, we believe, that upwards of a million of horses are kept in England for pleasure alone: we say nothing of the horses employed for the purposes of agriculture. A tax of thirty shillings per annum on each of these horses would amount to a million and a half sterling. Another million and a half imposed as a rate upon the various counties would provide fully for the £2,778,000 at present required for the maintenance of the roads, and leave a margin to be employed as a sinking fund for the payment of the debt of eight millions. As the abolition of tolls would lead to a saving of the whole sum at present expended upon the support of idle toll-keepers, we should not greatly err in assuming this margin as between half and three-quarters of a million per annum. The tax of thirty shillings per annum on horses kept for pleasure would, so far from being oppressive, be, we think, a positive boon. It would not amount to a penny a day; and no one who rides a horse for his pleasure, under the present toll system, escapes at so light a rate from the clutch of the "pike" man. If there are any objections to this plan, we should like to see them stated. Perhaps, when the bill reaches its first or second stage, the subject will be brought under the notice of the Government. We think it deserving of attention, in the interest of all parties.

"DIVIDING" IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The business of "dividing" in the House of Commons, as at present conducted, would appear to be attended with considerable loss of time.

When the members proceed to a division, the result is ascertained by what "a Parliamentary reporter," in the Times of Monday, designates a "jog-trot mode." He adds:—"Members have to be got into their respective right and left lobbies, before anything can be done; and, when this is accomplished, they have to be counted out one by one; each particular name has to be shouted aloud, made sure of, told, and then written down by the clerks at the table. And, when 400 or more names are in question, this entire operation, on one division, will occupy 40 minutes: and, at last, there is often an error as to a number or a name."

The Illustration upon the preceding page shews the present routine of the business.

The Correspondent then suggests the following expedient as a remedy:—"At the entrance to the room or lobby into which the members are collected, there should be fitted up a turnstile (I am not aware of the technical term) such as that with which the paripatetics of Waterloo-bridge are familiar. Each turn of the machine, admitting one passenger, registers the passage. I find by a rough calculation, that 150 members could pass through such a machine in about five minutes; and the dial-plate, at the end of the five minutes, would at once show the state of the motion at stake. The names of the members could be given on cards, prepared for the purpose, like checks, and each member could lay his check down as he passes through. The "tellers" could act as the clerks take."

In proof of the loss of time by the present plan, the Correspondent states that, "On particular nights, in the middle of the session, when railway and other such bills are pleading, and when clauses of all sorts of bills are contested vigorously in committee, I have known an aggregate three hours lost in the process of getting members into their lobbies and telling them out again. On nights even of the most ordinary business an hour at least goes in this way."

"Certainly, when you can go from London to the Mersey in five hours and a half, it does seem rather absurd that a gentleman should have to devote half an hour or more in prosecuting round a House of Commons 'teller.'"

INGROSSING AND INROLLING OF BILLS.—The House of Lords resolved, on the 8th inst., to adopt the following arrangements as regards the present system of ingrossing bills, which is to be discontinued; viz.:—"1. That in lieu of being ingrossed, every bill shall be printed fair immediately after it shall have been passed in the House in which it originated, and that such printed bill shall be sent to the other House, as the bill so passed, and shall (subject to the regulation next hereinafter mentioned) be dealt with by that House and its officers in the same manner in which ingrossed bills are now dealt with. 2. That on its return to the House in which it originated, without amendments (or if amended, after the amendments shall have been settled and agreed to), it shall be fair printed by the printer of such House, who shall furnish a fair print upon vellum to the House of Lords before the Royal assent, and likewise a duplicate of the same, also on vellum. 3. That one of such fair prints of each bill shall be duly authenticated by the proper officers of each House as the bill to which Houses have agreed. 4. That the Royal assent shall be indorsed in the usual on such fair print so authenticated, which shall be deposited in the Record Tower, in lieu of the present ingrossment. 5. That the copies promulgated in the first instance by the Queen's printer shall be impressions from the same form as the deposited copy. 6. That for the present session this arrangement shall not apply to private bills, nor to local and personal bills, which last-mentioned bills, intended to be brought in this session, have been, for the most part, already printed, in pursuance of the standing orders of the House of Commons. 7. That the Master of the Rolls shall, upon being duly authorised in that behalf, receive, in lieu of the copies of public general acts as now inrolled, the hereinbefore mentioned duplicate fair prints of such public general bill, to be dealt by the same purposes, and subject to the same conditions for and upon which the inrolled acts are now received and held by him. 8. That it is expedient, with a view to economy, convenience, and despatch, and to the diminution of the chance of errors, that one printer should print the public general bills for both Houses, and that inasmuch as the Queen's printer is by virtue of his office bound to print the acts, it would be advisable, for the attainment of the before mentioned objects, that the Queen's printer should be employed by both Houses to print the public general bill."

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS IN IRELAND.—A return of all persons who have been committed to, or detained in prison in Ireland since the passing of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, by warrant of the Lord-Lieutenant or Chief Secretary, for high treason or treasonable practices, or suspicion thereof, has been printed by order of the House of Commons. It appears that from the 26th of July, 1848, the date of the first warrant, to the 16th Dec., 1848 persons have been committed to prison: of these, 35 were discharged on bail, and the remainder are still in custody.

THE INDIAN MAIL.—The Nemaphore, of Marseilles, states that the last English mail that left that city for India contained such a quantity of letters that the additional postage amounted to the enormous sum of 9000 francs (£360). Previous to the reduction in the postage of letters the mail for Algiers consisted at most of five bags; since then the number has increased to eleven, and that for Philippeville from three to eight.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PRESENT STATE OF PARIS

PARIS, 14th February, 1849.

After its fever-fit of a day, Paris has, for the last week, somewhat recovered its self possession, and even does its best to look as joyous and gay as of yore in Carnival-tide. But, continual fever-fits have left its nerves weak, and its system "shaky:" the various violent convulsive attacks of the past year have had too powerful an effect not to render each fresh one, however slight and transitory, a severer illness than it outwardly seems, setting the patient back again into its state of languor and torpidity. Ministerial doctors may thus administer calming doses of confidence and reassurance, and assume that the struggle is past, and the danger averted, at least for a time; but Paris, that is to say, communicated Paris, the Paris of the bourgeoisie, still keeps a sickly, lack-adaisical, hypochondriac look, shakes its head, complains wofully of its intestine pains, and, in spite of the assurances of its doctors, dreads another attack of that rankling fever which it declares to be still lurking in its system, and preparing to shatter and undermine it. On the other hand, however, Paris, which always is a rake at heart, fiddles, dances, eats petits soupers, and yells through the last days of its Carnival, as if the spirit of St. Vitus possessed it in its sticky state, and there is no doubt that these little doses of excitement, by giving a sort of factitious impulse to the blood, in however small a way, give, at the same time, a semblance of life and spirit. The middling and commercial classes, it is true, hold themselves back in this fête-giving season, or, at most, indulge their love of expense and variety at the theatres. The former banking world of the Chaussée d'Antin—that gaudy, somewhat tawdry, and over-gilded world of the last reign—still bangs its head sadly, and hides its diminished splendours, or tarnished pecuniary circumstances, behind its closed shutters doors; but the Faubourg St. Germain, which, in spite of its policy of assumed indifference and quiet expectation, cannot quite conceal its "Legitimist" hopes, and even the species of confidence implied by the very quietude of that expectation itself, dances much and joyously, although en gros petit comité, and more exclusively than ever, in the company of the *Duc de * * * yous très pensant*. The foreigners, however, are more or less accustomed to revolutionary alarms during the experience of the past year, and who, in quest of their usual dose of travelling excitement, declare in this far preferable in its revolutionary aspect to Rome, Vienna, Florence, Berlin, or any other revolutionary capital, and not so militant, after all, in its expression, as it looks at a distance, still keep up the tradition of these dancing fêtes in which Paris started in its days of rich ambassadorial festivities, and open their houses to the old "fashionable world" and the rising generation, who will not be deprived by revolutions of their share of the "pleasures of life," and to the Court and Opera balls where the allurements of its frantic and convulsive galeties to crowds who flock to them, with all the spirit of a reaction in favour of pleasure, after so much political ennui, in greater force than for many years past. These strange weakly saturnalia, so peculiar, at least to such an extent of wildness, to Paris, offer no new aspect; but it is this very want of change that is their present peculiarity in these days of a Republic. The true Republican look on and denounce them as "reactionary," inasmuch as not a trace of Republican spirit pervades either in their ensemble or their details: the old Chicorée, and Pompadour, Ballardiere abounds, as of yore, in the gross crowded, and decidedly lighted dancing amphitheatre; but, alas! not one Republican costume is visible; not even a Democratic student assumes the dress of a hero of the Convention, or of a merveilleux of the old Republic; not a revolutionary grisette, in spite of the all-pervasive of the decoltad, so much in vogue in these immense Parisian orgies, puts on the undress of a "Déesse de la Raison." Well may Democrats denounce "reaction," when indifference to the symbols of true Republicanism, as they call the return to the Republican absurdities of past time, is carried to such an excess! Still more do they clamour at the reactionary evidence exhibited in the Vaudeville Theatre, where the "Folie aux lieues" is nightly played to over crowded houses along with the "Propriété, c'est le Vol;" for there it is not the public of the house or the stalls, the so-called "infamous aristocrats," that applauds so fervently, and requires the encore of all the hits against the Republic but it is the public of the pit and the galleries, the public of the "people," that displays these decidedly indubitable symptoms of "reaction." General Cavaignac, when present, not long ago, at this performance, is said to have left the house "à coeur navré" at the exhibition of this spirit among the lower classes Paris, then, has neither a calm, or rather has an on a reckless gaiety of aspect, during the past week. It is true that the military air which it once monassumed on the 29th of last month has been by no means laid aside. The principal public buildings are still strictly guarded; patrols are frequent and heavy all through the night; and every now and then, in the gloom of the evening, bands of gardiens de Paris, with their cocked hats, large Dutch-like cloaks and pointed hats, may be seen silently advancing along the streets, to the amount of eighty or ninety, headed in brigades by commissaries of police, and proceeding to the barriers at the distant extremities of the capital, in order to surprise and close an illicit cab, or arrest the members of a société secrète. On Sunday, also, an immense review of the garrison of Paris was held in the Champ de Mars by General Changarnier, about once or twice a month; and these thoroughfares of the capital were flooded with torrents of steel bayonets glittering in the sun, as the troops returned to their respective quarters. This display of immense military force in Paris all the air of an intimidation and a threat; and as such, consequently, is denounced by the ultra-democratic journals: but, even were the display really so intended, it was no less hailed and applauded as such by the great Parisian, who, in spite of his love of variety and pleasure, to the evidences of energy; and demand, rather than condemn, intimidation They know where are their real enemies, and how necessary it is to keep them in awe

To calm has extended itself, also, for some days at least, to the ever-tumultuous Assembly. That flood of light and life which has inundated Paris for the last week with the brightest rays of the clearest, most sparkling winter sun, and all warmth of May, has been too much for the esprit de fidélerie, which is a country's representative system—at least in its present period, is from, and with some notable modifications to prolong their own existence; but they had voted it, in spite of the manœuvres and reiterated propositions of the Extreme Left party; and now they surely had a right to "enjoy themselves." There was no prospect, also, of those dramatic "incidents," in the dram-drinking of which they had been accustomed to indulge; no scratchings—no skirmishings—no recriminations: they would have lost their time! Jupiter Mountain, even, gave up its self-imposed task of thundering On Monday only there was a prospect of a good "row;" and the Assembly again assumed its wonted aspect. "Interpellations" were again the order of the day. The words are to be used by Marshal Bugeaud at Bourges, that he was ready, upon the first signal, to march against Paris at the head of the Departments, and that the army of the Alps was necessary at home to keep the revolutionary capita. in awe, afforded a fine opportunity for the denunciations of the "Mountain," and its associations of a reactionary history. In spite of its having, however, the slight advantage of being to the "order of the day" and the Mountain had done no more than get up another fight for the representatives, at which they thought it worth their while to be present.

The revolutionary excitement of the week, then, has been almost entirely confined to the noisy demonstrations of a sort of ambulatory democratic club, which has taken upon itself to parade the boulevards, and the shops of the Palais de Boulevaux are exhibited in prints, or in busts, or as vignettes to songs—and, spite of the sort of illegal anti-legitimist attack made by the Government in seizing the pictures and busts of M. Prudhon, the popular democratic idol. In every part of Paris—and destroying them by force. How far these demonstrations may be allowed to extend, is doubtful, but, if permitted to continue, they will find work enough on their hands. The ultra-democratic, it is true, keep up an active firing against everything except the true and genuine "Red" Republicans, and denounce all things and all men with a convulsion of threat and hatred: they even call the condemnation of the murderers of Generals Bréa and Lamoricière sacrilege, and deify those unhappy "heroes" as martyrised on the cross of political hatred" What next? Fortunately, two of their leading organs, the Démocratie, misnamed Pacifique, and the People, have fallen to bigger heads among themselves; and M. Considérant, of the one, and the famous M. Proudhon, of the other (both democratic representatives), have each other "savage" and "traitor," no more or less than were they "infamous reactionists!" S

FRANCE.

The Committee of the National Assembly appointed to examine and report upon the proposition of M. Portalis for celebrating the anniversary of the revolution of February, have recommended that the 25th of February shall henceforth be observed as a strict holyday. The Committee also recommend that on that day in all the communes of France, and that a sum of 500,000f. (£20,000) shall be granted to the Minister of the Interior for distribution. It is said that the Committee intended to take this opportunity of pardoning or commuting the punishment of the political offenders.

Communal Assemblies, who had been consulted to the military prison of the Abbaye, by order of General Changarnier, on the 28th of January, was released on Tuesday. He was informed at the same time that he would be permitted to retain the command of the 6th battalion of the Garde Mobile.

The trial of M. Delescluze, editor of the Révolution Democrate et Sociale, for a seditious libel, which was to have commenced on Tuesday, was adjourned in consequence of the indisposition of M. Ledru Rollin, who was to have conducted the defence.

The Minister of the Interior has given orders that the bonnets rouges attached to some of the trees of liberty planted in Paris shall be immediately removed. Two of these hideous objects were removed on Monday night from a tree in the Place Dauphine. In some of the southern departments their removal, in a few localities where they had been allowed to remain unmolested for some time, was attended with disturbances, particularly in the town of Cette, where the authorities, being unable to get at the "red cap," cut down the tree of liberty which it surmounted. The National Guard of the place had been disarmed by the Government, in consequence of not ranging themselves on the side of order on the occasion.

On Wednesday in the National Assembly, M. Marrast was re-elected President by 408 votes, to 213 given to M. Dufaure. The Assembly afterwards granted the authorisation to prosecute M. Prendhon, one of its members, for a libel on the President of the Republic. It subsequently resumed the discussion on M. Lanjuinais' proposition relative to its dissolution, and rejected, by 459 to 347, an amendment by M. Emile Péan, when it voted the Assembly to discuss and vote the budget of 1849 previous to the promulgation of the electoral law.

Those incendiary pests, "the Clubs," have been extirpated, owing to the active measures and energy of the police, and the conviction, by the tribunals, of the principal speakers

On Monday and the succeeding day of this week the magnificent furniture in the Hôtel Ladrière (Rue Lafitte, No. 21) was sold by auction. Those splendid salons were filled with precious objects of art, consisting of bronzes in every shape and form, Sevres China and Japan porcelain surpass of the richest fabric, curtains of the finest damask, plate, mirrors, articles of furniture of all kinds and of the most varied and beautiful workmanship. During the sale, notwithstanding the general depression of commerce, there was a considerable outlay of money, which, being expended on mere articles of vertu and objects of luxury, showed a symptom of a gradual return to ancient habits. The most extravagant prices were paid for vases, candelabra, and even minute articles of Sevres porcelain.

SPAIN.

A rumour of the death of the Carlist General Cabrera has been contradicted. From the seat of the Guerilla warfare, now carried on by the insurgents, we learn that near the frontiers of Navarre, 220 muskets, and several boxes of gunpowder and ball-cartridge, had been lately found concealed in the Spanish part of the wood of Iraity. About 40 Spanish refugees, one of whom was a commandant, had been arrested. Prince Adalbert, of Bavaria, has left Madrid for France. The necessary precautions had been adopted for his security, and his carriage was to be escorted as far as the French frontier. The Chamber of Deputies was engaged in discussing the Waste Land Bill.

ITALIAN STATES.

ROME.—The Roman Constituent Assembly was opened with much pomp on the 5th instant. The Deputies went in procession from the Capitol to the Palace of the Chancery, the old hall of which had been fitted up for their reception. At one of the doors they took their seats, when the Senior Deputy having been called to the chair, M. Armellini, Minister of the Interior, read a speech, in which he endeavoured to demonstrate the incompatibility existing between the temporal power of the Pope and the spiritual power of his office. On having the Tribune, he exclaimed, "Italy and the People for ever!" and the auditory repeated the same cries. The Deputies were mostly young men, and about 140 present. Rome was perfectly tranquil.

PIEDMONT.—There has been a slight modification of the Ministry. Gen. Chiodo has been appointed Minister of War, in the room of M. della Marmora. The Marquis Antonio Pareto was elected, on the 8th inst., President of the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies

The Venice Gazette of the 3d contains a notice inviting the Deputies of the province of Venice to assemble in the Ducal Palace on the 9th, for the despatch of business. The Austrian balloon scheme for the bombardment of Venice has utterly failed.

PRUSSIA

At Berlin, the elections for the members of the Upper Chamber of the Legislature have terminated in favour of the moderate Conservative party

AUSTRIA

Our accounts this week from Vienna state that the attempts to assassinate soldiers and officers still continued, without any clue being obtained to the conspiracy with which those crimes have originated.

There is no other news of interest.

HUNGARY.

The intelligence from this quarter is vague and meagre.

General Bem still holds out: but the Diet of the Hungarian Diet continues to hold its sittings at Debrezin, which city is inundated with an excessive issue of paper money, that has caused prices to rise to an unexampled height.

ICARIA.

The Mémorial de Rouen publishes a letter dated New Orleans, the 25th of December, from a workman of that place, who left with one of the bands of M. Cabet's colonists for Icaria. In this letter, which is addressed by the writer to his daughter, he says:—"Icaria exists no more for the present. Nine of our unfortunate friends are dead of hunger, misery, and the climate. The 75 others are only walking skeletons, traversing the deserts under a burning sun, without bread, without money, without prayer, and without any hope. As for me, I remained at New Orleans, where he contrives to gain a good subsistence.

DRAINING THE MINES OF SIERRA MORENA

An English company have leased the celebrated silver mines of Guadalcanal, near Seville, in Spain, which have been under water for a period of 150 years. Before that time they produced to the Spanish Government £100,000 per annum in duties alone, and from the proceeds of these the Palace of the Escurial was built. They were the property of the Archbishops Fuchas, who, not satisfied with the enormous wealth they derived from them, secretly took away the crew from a new lode they discovered without giving notice to the Government, and, to prevent further discovery and confusion, they let the water into the mine, and for 150 years they have remained in the state in which they were thus left by them.

About six months ago, however, the mines were purchased by an English company on the most advantageous terms, and a capital of £16,000 was raised among a few English adventurers, in order to work them—M Nicholas Laws, Esq., Surveyor, of Hayle, who visited the Lake of Nemi, being one of them; and an engine of great power having been obtained, and transported, under the direction of Captain Michell and the engineer, Mr. Duncan Shaw, to the mine, bids fair to drain the lake in a few months, and discover its hidden wealth once more.

From advices recently received, the engine has drained the mine, in one month, to 15 fathoms level, and some very valuable specimens of silver ore have been taken from the lodes, and are now on their way to England.

From the Cheraw Patriot of January 6, we learn the following account of the commencement of operations, all the preparations for which were completed on the 23rd of December last:—

"The gigantic pump (says the writer) might consequently have entered on its subterranean labours from that day. But, like a thorough Englishman, the engineer determined to give the inauguration of the enterprise a solemn date—that of Christmas-day. He went further; he assembled some of the notabilties of the country, and, like a true son of Albion, collected on the spot a quantity of solids and liquids sufficient to have satisfied the cravings of a thousand famished Irishmen. The results of this step were advantageous, for, instead of some fifty persons, the entire population of the neighbouring country flocked to the scene of the enterprise. Alcaldes, lawyers, priests, shopkeepers, men, women, and children, deserted the little town of Guadalcanal, and raved, some on foot, others on mules, the most abominable of all things—a Spanish road. The undertaking excited in a high degree the curiosity of these people, and interested them in other respects. But however persuaded they might be of the superiority of British skill and perseverance, they were generally doubtful of success; the oldest among them shrugging their shoulders whilst they related the many failures in the attempts to overcome or even diminish, the ordeal so great as given by the engineer. The water-mark had been lowered five feet, and this result, which surpassed the most sanguine expectations of the workmen themselves, was received with rapturous demonstrations of joy and unbounded confidence.

"It then only remained for those present to do justice to the repast; their incredulity was vanquished, and Spanish gravity put to the test. Then might be seen the Queen of Guadalcanal, forgetting the traditions of the olla podrida, making resolute onslaughts on the 'roast beef of Old England.' The Andalusians present were not forgotten; from 50 to 60 pounds of bonbons, and cakes without number, were offered with civility, and accomplished with satisfaction.

"On the morrow, the dawn had no sooner lightened the Sierra Morena, than cries of joy and shouts of merriment were yet to be distinguished in the midst of English and Spanish congratulations and confused. The noise thereby created did not, however, prevent the occasional impression of British tips on Andalusian cheeks being heard. But I will not dwell upon these scenes, which are the effect of the general enthusiasm."

MUNIFICENT BEQUESTS.—A lady, recently deceased, who for many years resided at Hammersmith (the late Miss Fenn), has by her will bequeathed a sum of £1000 stock in the Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents to the School for the Indigent Blind in St. George's-fields. The deceased lady for many years laboured under the severe calamity of loss of sight, and, with a feeling of commiseration for her poorer fellow-creatures similarly affected to herself, and with a view to contribute to the alleviation of their distresses, she has made the above munificent bequest in aid of the funds of the institution referred to. The testatrix was also a subscriber of the annual musical concerts. Dr. W. Hayes, and, mindful of the misfortunes of the poorer members of that profession of which he was so distinguished a member, she has bequeathed a legacy of £1,000 stock in the Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents to the Royal Society of Musicians, established for the support of the decayed members of that profession. Miss Fenn has also left a legacy of £500 stock to the National Benevolent Institution.

RAILWAYS.—A return to the hon. the House of Commons, on a motion of Mr. J. Maitland, M.P., shows that the number of railways for which Acts of Parliament were passed in the session of 1845 (the 8th Vict.) amounted to 85; the total length of the lines to 370 miles 60 chains; the length of deviation, to 155 miles 684 chains; the amount of capital stock, to £10,904,856, and the sum of money the companies were empowered to borrow, to £4,360,571. The foregoing 85 acts may thus be classified, viz. 6 amalgamation and lease. &c. acts; 3 for the purchase of canals; 12 for extension of time and sundry amendments of acts; 17 for deviations, extension, and other works for which no new capital was required; 2 for new lines by new companies; 26 for branches, extensions, and deviations by existing companies; 6 for stations; 3 for harbours, ferries, and docks; 2 for steam-boats; and 8 for additional capital for works already authorised. The total increase of mileage occasioned by the above acts was 330 miles 1 chains. The total increase of capital was £14,620,471.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE nominated the committee on the Irish Poor-law. The noble Lord's list was agreed to.

Lord MONTEAGLE moved for a committee to inquire into the present mode of keeping accompanying accounts, and to suggest a mode of auditing them.

The motion was agreed to; and the noble Lord allowed the case of the Chairman and Secretary of the North Wales Railway to stand over.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

RAILWAY TRAVELLING ON SUNDAY.—To a question put by Mr. Locke, Mr. LABOUCHERE said he would feel reluctant to propose any measure to compel railway companies to carry passengers on Sundays, though he was of opinion that some arrangement, not incompatible with a proper respect for the Sabbath, could be made for a limited use of railroads. He hoped public opinion would operate on those Scotch companies who too rigidly refused all accommodation, and induce them to relax their rules against all Sunday travelling.

THE TOOTING ESTABLISHMENT.—In reply to Lord Drumlanrig, Mr. HAINES stated that the number of children in Dronet's establishment had been reduced from 1200 to 223, and that the number was being daily reduced. There had been no case since that of cholera at Tooting since the 13th of January.

BURIALS IN TOWNS.—To a question from Mr. Urquhart, Lord J. RUSSELL replied that a measure was in preparation on the subject of burials in large towns.

CALIFORNIA.—In answer to Sir De Lacy Evans, Sir F. Baring said he could hold out no hope that a vessel of war would be permanently stationed at San Francisco, California, though the naval officer in command on the station would not overlook San Francisco.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT.

On the motion, by Sir G. GREY, to go into committee on the Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Bill,

Mr. J. O'CONNELL moved—That it be an instruction to the committee to introduce such provisions into the bill as shall guard and save intact the right of the subject to hold meetings to petition for the enactment, repeal, or alteration of acts of Parliament, or for redress of grievances, or other constitutional object, without other or further restriction of the rights of those existed under the operation of the common and statute law of the land previous to the passing of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act of last July.

J. Russell for having exonerated him on Friday last from the charge of being implicated in excitements to rebellion; but that would not have much effect with the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, who had treated the Repeal Association as if its members were mixed up with the insurgents who made such a miserable demonstration in July last.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL opposed the amendment.

After a debate, in which Mr. Roche, Colonel Rawdon, Mr. Reynolds, and Mr. Anstey took part,

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL, however, divided on the question that the Speaker leave the chair.—

For going into committee

Majority for the Government	.. .. ..	70

The House went into committee on the bill, and, after two divisions, its clauses were agreed to.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

The adjourned debate on the resolution, in committee of the whole House, or voting an amount not exceeding £50,000 for the relief of Irish distress, was resumed.

Mr. F. SCROPE withdrew the amendment which he had moved, as he did not wish to object to the vote of money, though he desired to have it made as a loan, and conditional on being employed in productive works. The honourable member gave notice that he would move his amendment on the bringing up of the report.

Mr GRATTAN moved, as an amendment, in substitution of the vote—That the collectors of Excise, in Ireland, be henceforth directed and do in future pay into the office of Vice-Treasurer, in Dublin, the amount of all fines, penalties and quilt-law unions in that country. The honourable member charged the absentees as being the real cause of Irish poverty, and calculated that, during the last fifty years, £168,000,000 had been abstracted from Ireland by absentees and by Crown and quit-rents.

Mr. BERNAL, the Chairman of the Committee, decided that Mr. Grattan's amendment could not be entertained, because it was not competent for an individual to propose to deal with the revenue of the Crown, without the consent of the Crown signified in the usual way.

Mr ORMSBY GORE defended his conduct as an absentee, declaring that "he could not reside everywhere." He announced his determination to vote against the grant of £50,000, because he thought such a grant most objectionable in principle.

Mr. Grattan's amendment fell to the ground.

Mr. AUGUSTUS STAFFORD moved, as an amendment to the vote, "That the continued application of sums of money, raised by the general taxation of the country to the relief of local distress in Ireland, is violative of the principle laid down in practice, and impolitic with respect to the suffering districts themselves, as tending to destroy all spirit of self-reliance. That the Commons cannot assent to any vote of money for the temporary mitigation of such distress, until it shall have received from her Majesty's advisers an estimate of the whole charge which will be requisite for this purpose. That it is the duty of her Majesty's Government to introduce without delay measures which may obviate the future necessity of applying to Parliament for the relief of local distress in Ireland." The hon. member moved his three resolutions as an addition to the vote.

Lord J. RUSSELL was glad to find that the hon. member did not intend to refuse the grant, but contented himself with moving three resolutions impeaching the conduct of the Government. The hon. member proposed, in the first resolution, to give an estimate of the whole sum that would be required, but that was to be contrary to all precedent and to practical wisdom. As to the second resolution, this was an extraordinary emergency, and on that account justified the conduct of the Government with respect to the measures taken and to be taken. A large and extended Poor-Law had been fixed on Ireland, and in the last year not less than £1,000,000 had been levied on the rates and property of Ireland for the support of the poor. This was a great step. There was a prospect, too, of improvement in the state of some of the unions. It had been said that this was the first of a series of grants. Neither he nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made any such declaration. All that had been said was, that the Government could not pledge themselves that £50,000 would be all that would be required. It would be his duty to propose to the Committee on the Irish Poor-Law the measures that would be necessary for the amendment of the law in such a manner as to be beneficial to Ireland and least burdensome to this country. The first and most important amendment that would be proposed to the committee would be to give encouragement to those who lay out capital in the cultivation of the land, which people were now unwilling to occupy. But the Government were not prepared to state at once into what division of the county into small properties advocated by the hon. member. With respect to the third resolution, he (Lord J. Russell) did contemplate measures that would have the tendency of obviating the necessity of future grants. He considered Ireland was undergoing without that great loss of life and property that might have been anticipated. He felt confident that the House would not visit on the starving people of Connaught the sins of the Government.

The Marquis of GRANBY agreed with the noble Lord that it would be unfair to visit the misconduct of the Government on the suffering poor; while, therefore he was prepared to vote the £50,000, he had a right to be informed what the total amount would be that would be required.

Colonel SIBTHORP supported the amendment.

Mr. HUME could not agree to the addition, neither could he vote for the grant. Mr. Hume said that the evils of Ireland were cheap produce and dear money. The manufactures of this country were being borne down by the competition of other countries. There was plenty of trade in Germany, but it was not in British manufactures. The glass-makers, who were in a most flourishing state three years ago for Free-ports Half a dozen of our trades had actually vanished. With respect to the amendment he (Mr. Hume) could not vote for it, though he was decidedly opposed to the grant.

The House divided:—

For Mr. A. Stafford's amendment	.. .. ..	12
Against it		241
Majority against the amendment		129

The House then divided on the proposed grant:—

For the vote		220
Against it		143
Majority for the Government	.. ..	77

The vote was then agreed to.

The report of the Inland Revenue Bill was received.

Sir WILLIAM SOMERVILLE moved the addition of five members to the committee on the Irish Poor-law.

On Mr. SHAW'S names being proposed,

Captain TALBOT objected, and, after a smart conversation, in which Mr. Bate seconded, Mr. F. Maule, Colonel Dunne, and Mr. Reynolds took part, the House divided:—

For Mr. Bright's name		129
Against it		74
Majority		55

The five additional names proposed by Sir WILLIAM SOMERVILLE were agreed to.

The committee on the Army and Ordnance Estimates was nominated, on the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

The House adjourned at two o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Their lordships met as usual at five o'clock, and sat for half an hour.

RAILWAY ACCOUNTS.—On the motion of Lord MONTEAGLE, the select committee to inquire into the subject of establishing a better system of auditing railway accounts was nominated.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Frederick Peel (son of Sir Robert) took the oaths and his seat for Leominster.

The Dublin Consolidated Improvement Waterworks and Sewers Company Bill was, after some discussion, postponed for a fortnight.

Mr. HAWES, in reply to a question by Mr V. Smith, stated that Sir H. Pottinger's report of the expenses of the Kaffir war had been received, but was not yet in a condition to be presented to Parliament.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.—On the subject of railways in India, Sir J. C. HOBHOUSE stated that it was thought preferable that these undertakings should be carried out by private companies; but should they not be, the Indian Government had come to no determination not to carry them out themselves.

IRISH FISHERIES.—Mr. ANSTEY moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of the inland fisheries and navigation of Ireland. His object was to make the protection of these fisheries a matter of police, and to prevent improper obstructions by weirs, and to interfere with existing rights. By the present defective system, he believed, not less than £200,000 a year was lost to the country.—After some observations from the O'Gorman Mahon, Sir W. Somerville, Mr. Herbert, Sir J. Young, and Mr. Fagan, the motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF REAL PROPERTY.—Mr. H. DRUMMOND asked for leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the transfer of real property, which, after a few words from the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, was granted.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.—Sir J. PAKINGTON applied for, and obtained, leave to bring in a bill for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at elections. He reserved all explanation of his remedy till the second reading, as he contemplated no opposition on his motion, seeing the admitted extent to which the corrupt practices had gone at the two last general elections.

TURNPIKE ROAD.—Mr. C. LEWIS moved for leave to bring in a bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to public roads in England He proposed to abolish parochial liability to the maintenance of the roads and the turnpike trusts, and to take the county as the area of taxation and management; the magistracies, to be called the County Road Board. With regard to local management, he proposed to take the poor-law unions as the districts, and that the county board should have the power of dividing all the roads into two classes, viz. main roads and cross roads, and to maintain the present debts of the trusts, which amounted to £8,000,000, he proposed to pay off in not less than seventy, nor exceeding 20 years, by means of a county roads fund and a toll, which, under certain regulations, would still be collected in the main roads. The motion was, after a brief conversation, agreed to.

DOCKS AT CORNWALL.—A motion by Mr. TRELAWNY, of an instruction to the Committee on the Woods and Forests to extend their inquiry to the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, was opposed by Lord J. RUSSELL, on the ground that the Cornwall bill was settled a compact was entered into between Parliament and the Crown that the latter should retain the revenues of the Duchies. Mr. M. GIBSON remarked upon the inconvenience of having these independent principalities and jurisdictions in the country. If the system of management were altered, a much larger revenue might be obtained. The motion was withdrawn.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS IN IRELAND.—Sir W. SOMERVILLE obtained leave to introduce two bills, one to amend the laws for regulating the qualification and registration of voters in Ireland, and the other for shortening the duration of elections in Ireland, and for establishing additional polling-places. The object of the first measure was to do away with the county qualification arising from property, substituting for it a rating qualification of £8 to the poor-rate, coupled with the condition of payment of rates for six months previous to registration He also proposed to establish a £5 qualification in fee or rental. In the boroughs franchise he proposed to make the qualification depend entirely on the £5 rating, and payment six months before registration. He proposed also to adopt the English system of annual revision of the register.—Mr. A. STAFFORD thought it incongruous to extend the political franchise, while they were limiting personal liberty.—Mr. E. B. ROCHE objected to the measure as not going far enough.—Lord BERNARD condemned the bill and the whole policy of the Government.—Mr. GROGAN suggested that, before basing the qualification on the poor rate, ministers should have provided for a uniform system of valuation.—Mr. O CONNELL said a few words in favour of the motion, which was agreed to; and the House adjourned at the early hour of nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at 12 o'clock

INSOLVENT MEMBERS BILL.

Mr. MOFFATT moved the second reading of this bill. His purpose was not to interfere with the privileges of the House, nor with the freedom of its members from arrest, but to extend the principle of the Act of 1812, which relieved bankrupt members retaining their seats, to insolvents. He did not propose to apply the same principle to the House of Lords, first, because it did not so wish to interfere with their privileges; and secondly, because he believed, if the House of Commons once refused to be made the refuge of insolvent debtors, the Lords would not be long in following their example.

Sir G. GREY, finding that this bill was free from the objections which attached to the one of last year, expressed his intention of supporting its principle, but proposed to submit some amendments in committee.

Mr. BERNAL objected to many of the details of the bill, especially to that which left an interregnum in the seat of the insolvent member during six months, until the vesting order was obtained.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS warmly supported the bill, and hoped its principle would be adopted by the other House.

After a few words from Mr. HENLEY, the bill was read a second time.

On the question fixing a certain day for the committee on the bill,

Mr. GREEN suggested that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. EWART and other members objected to that course, but recommended a postponement for a fortnight, which was ultimately agreed to; Sir G. GREY undertaking to have the amendments he proposed to move printed and circulated previous to the next discussion.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

On the subject of the repeal of the Navigation Laws, Mr. GLADSTONE put a question as to whether Mr. Baines (whose speech delivered at his re-election for Wakefield was the right hon gentleman characterised as manly and straightforward) had stipulated on joining the Government that on that particular question he should be free to vote as he pleas.

Lord J. RUSSELL replied that ministers considered Mr. Baines' services in the administration of the Poor-law so important, that on his declining to take office unless on the understanding that he should be free to vote against the repeal of the Navigation Laws, they agreed to accept his services on those terms, and justified that course by a reference to the cases of Mr. Wynn and Lord Lansdowne, who, on particular questions, had voted against the respective governments of which they were members.

The House having resolved itself into committee,—

Mr. LABOUCHERE rose to move his resolution, with the view to the amendment of the Navigation Laws, and proceeded to recapitulate the main provisions of the former bill. The principle of the existing Navigation Laws was threefold—to secure to us the monopoly of the colonial trade, the long voyage trade, and the European direct carrying trade. The first law Protection was withdrawn, in or course of withdrawal from the colonies, we could no longer with any justice maintain. The injurious effects of our laws in this respect were strikingly illustrated in the difficulties they presented to the North American colonists in competing with their neighbours of the United States, and great credit was due to them for the patience and good feeling they had exhibited under such circumstances. The next restriction required that the produce was to be brought to our ports in British vessels only, shutting our as it did the raw produce, while it admitted it when manufactured, operated as a direct encouragement to our own carrying trade, and with regard to the third restriction, which attempted to secure to us the carrying trade, it could only be successful so long as it was confined to ourselves and acquiesced in by foreigners; for if every nation were to act upon it, we, as the greatest maritime nation in the world, would be the greatest losers—and, in fact, foreign nations had already shown a disposition to retaliate. Prussia had already remonstrated; and there was but little doubt, if we did not abolish the system beforehand, Russia would do the same. In the existing treaty, adopt it repeal it as you pleased. He proposed now, as he had proposed last session, to repeal these restrictions, leaving part, to deal against any country in respect to which it might appear to Government to be useful to British interests to do so. He proposed also following the bill of last session, to entitle foreign-built ships to register as British vessels, provided they were British owned and manned; and he did this, confident that the ship-building interest of this country had nothing to fear from the competition of the world. He further proposed to put an end to that part of the law which compelled ship-owners to take a certain number of apprentices, and which had long formed the subject of complaint. With regard to the coasting trade, he felt strongly the force of the objections urged last year by Mr. Gladstone, and therefore he proposed to retain the restrictions against foreigners, but to modify them in such a way as would, he believed, place us in a position to invite from the United States that participation in the coasting trade of America which our commerce required, without exposing our revenue to danger, or existing alarm amongst our seafaring population. That part of our coasting trade which consisted merely in passing to and fro from one port of the United Kingdom to another, he left precisely on its present footing. He proposed to allow either British or foreign vessels, when sailing from a British to a foreign port, to carry their cargoes from one British port to another, and then to clear out for a foreign port when completed. He found it necessary, for the protection of the revenue, to limit this permission to vessels of less than 100 tons burthen. He added that he intended to re-introduce the bill of last session with respect to the light dues; and another for a better arrangement of the merchant seamen's fund. The question of tonnage had also been considered, and a measure was in course of preparation, which it was hoped would remove the objections of the existing system

Mr. HERRIES did not intend to oppose the resolution, but reserved to himself the right to oppose the second reading of the bill, at which stage it was understood the discussion should be taken. He complained that Mr Labouchere had refused him and his friends all information as to the alteration he proposed from through the ordinary channels of communication. With regard to the coasting trade, what security had we when we had given up our exclusive privileges, that America, France, and other countries would do the same? And with regard to the measure generally, the effect of it was, that while we threw open to foreign countries those privileges which we now enjoyed—the exclusive right to trade with our colonies, the coasting trade, and the long voyage—we merely reserve to ourselves a power of retaliating if they do not make similar concessions to us. France, which was even now taking stringent means to protect her own navigation, would probably refuse; and what would be the position of our relations with that sensitive nation if we afterwards attempted to take from her the facilities we gave to other countries? Ministers should have negotiated with foreign states, and ascertained how far they were prepared to meet us on this question before committing themselves to it. If they were anxious to do justice to the colonies, let them give them that protection to which they were entitled, and which Canada, as well as the others, had demanded. But the question was not a mere commercial one: the purpose for which the Navigation Laws were established and maintained was of even greater importance than mere commerce—it was the advantage, the safety of the state.

Mr DRUMMOND looked upon the measure as one of a series emanating from this Manchester school, the end and intention of which was to discharge British in order to give employment to foreign workmen.

Mr HUME held that the removal of all monopolies, whether in corn or shipping, was beneficial to the industry of this country. So far from America refusing to reciprocate, he believed Mr. Bancroft had intimated to Lord Palmerston that his Government were prepared to give perfect reciprocity.

Mr. BAINES agreed with Mr. Drummond, that free trade was a policy for the depression of the British labourer. He believed the colonies would much rather wait for the turn in public opinion, which was fast progressing, to give them a better and fairer system of legislature, than owe an advantage to a measure which would entail a serious evil on the whole empire.

Col. THOMPSON, who blunderingly, but successfully, advocated the free trade policy generally, contended that the argument that it was necessary to maintain the Navigation Laws for the sake of the national defences, was as much as to say that it was worth while to give a shilling for sixpenny worth in return. A military marine depended on other things than the mercantile navy, as, for instance, on the general wealth of the country; and even sailors might be bought too dear.

Mr HILDARD argued that the result of the measure would be to draw capital from this country, and make it dependent on foreign countries for its shipping.

Mr. RICARDO believed that the result of protection was to deteriorate, and he hoped to see the day when our shipowners and shipmasters would depend on their own energies instead of acts of Parliament.

Mr. Alderman THOMPSON considered that the United States could not, even if so disposed, give anything to us in exchange for the great advantages it was now proposed to surrender to them. There was, however, a general expectation that the new Government of America would increase their restrictive duties against us. America, from her geographical position, possessed many advantages over us. She had free trade with China; and the Navigation Laws destroyed, Americans goods would displace British manufactures in that market.

Mr. MITCHELL supported the measure; and Mr. ROBINSON, after speaking of the impossibility of the British shipbuilder competing with the foreign, unless protected, contended that the impediments which our Navigation Laws imposed operated only as against foreign countries, not against Britain. The present tonnage of the United States was now nearly equal to that of England, and what difference there would soon be twixt the two!

Mr. J. WILLIAMS supported the bill, believing it would tend to give increased employment to the people

Mr J. FERGUSON maintained that the abolition of protection had lowered the condition of the labourers and added to the burdens of the poor-rate, and that this bill would further increase the evil.

Mr. LABOUCHERE intimated that the Government had corresponded during the recess with foreign nations, in order to ascertain what course they would be disposed to take in the event of our Navigation Laws being repealed, and the papers on the subject would speedily be laid on the table.

The Marquis of GRANBY held that our naval superiority depended on the maintenance of the Navigation Laws, the repeal of which would in no way benefit the public at large.

Mr J O'CONNELL supported the resolution, which was carried, and a bill founded upon it ordered to be brought in.

WAYS AND MEANS.—A vote of £5,000,000 having been taken for ways and means,—

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT (IRELAND).—The order of the day for the report on the Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Bill was read; but Mr. J. O'Connell being anxious for another discussion, Sir G. Grey recommended him to speak till six o'clock, as he would have the opportunity of resuming when the question was brought on on Thursday. The suggestion was adopted, and the gentleman continued to address the House until he was interrupted by the Speaker leaving the chair at the hour.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships sat for a short time, and forwarded some bills a stage; amongst which were the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Bill and the Criminal Law Consolidation Bill, both of which were read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a select committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The House met at four o'clock, and a few minutes afterwards an adjournment took place, as there were but twenty-four members present.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE COUNTESS OF BRIDGEWATER.

CHARLOTTE-CATHERINE-ANNE, Countess of Bridgewater, only daughter and heiress of the late Samuel Haynes, Esq., and widow of John William, seventh Earl of Bridgewater, died suddenly on the 13th inst., at her splendid seat of Ashridge, near Berkhampstead, Herts, aged 86. Her Ladyship had complained of slight indisposition some days previously, but no serious apprehensions arose. The final dissolution was unattended with pain: while conversing with her female companions the Countess expired in her chair without a sigh or convulsion. In addition to a large private fortune, Lady Bridgewater became possessed, at the demise of her Earl's will, of very extensive landed estates. Under the strange terms of the late Earl, the fortune will devolve on the present Viscount Alford, and are to be enjoyed by him for a period of five years; but, at the expiration of that interval, Earl, the fortune will devolve on the present Viscount Alford, and are to be enjoyed by him for a period of five years; but, at the expiration of that interval, Earl, the fortune will devolve on the Lord Chancellor, with a similar proviso; and eventually, on her inability to carry out the stipulated conditions, the whole is devised, unreservedly, to Mr. Egerton, of Tatton Park, in Cheshire.

The deceased lady was most benevolent, and expended no inconsiderable portion of her princely fortune in acts of charity. Her loss will be deplored and deeply felt by the numerous recipients of her bounty.

DR. CURTOIS.

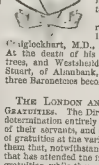
THE REV. Rowland Grove Curtois, D.D., whose death is just announced, was son of Rowland and Mary Curtois, his father was Vicar of Sixhill, Lincolnshire. He himself was born 30th June, 1786; was elected Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1804; took afterwards double First Class and Dean of the same College. In 1812 he received the appointment of Chaplain to her Majesty's Forces, in which capacity he served in the West Indies, Canada, and Gibraltar, and in 1832 he was nominated to the garrison of Chatham, where he remained till his retirement in 1845, making a period of twenty-seven years of active service.

Dr Curtois was, also, Domestic Chaplain to the Marquess of Queensberry, and Perpetual Curate of Hannah, Lincolnshire. The reverend gentleman married, first, in 1821, Louisa Georgina, daughter of Lieutenant-General Sir D L. Tuting Widdrington, and by her, who died in 1836, he had two sons. He married, secondly, in 1839, Mary, widow of the Rev. Ayliner Langhurst.

Dr. Curtois is much regretted. He was a person of great amenity, benevolence, and charity, and was universally respected. The family from which he derived was of remote antiquity, and claimed an early Norman origin.

SIR JAMES STUART, FIFTH BART. OF ALLANBANK, D.C.L.

SIR JAMES died at his house in Edinburgh, on the 29th of January. He was the eldest son of the late Sir John Stuart, Bart., of Allanbank, in the county of Berwickshire, and descended in a direct line from Sir Robert Stuart, the first Bart.



In early life Sir James Stuart entered the army as a cornet in the 3rd Light Dragoons; soon after he obtained a troop in the 7th Hussars, and in this regiment he continued until he retired from the army on account of ill health, in 1809, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in the service. His military life was spent on the staff, on which he served in the Walcher expedition, in 1809. In Ireland in 1812; at Buenos Ayres in 1807; and in Scotland in 1826.

His leisure was devoted to successful cultivation of art have long afforded gratification to his friends, and are known to the public by his spirited etchings of "Marmion," &c.

He married, first, Elizabeth Catherine, daughter of Arbrough Woodcock, Esq., who died in 1828; secondly, in 1835, Katharine, daughter of Alexander Monro, Esq., of Craigiockhart, M.D., Professor of Anatomy in the University of Edinburgh. At the death of his cousin, Sir James Steuart Denham, of Coltness, Goodstart, of Allanbank, Bart., his two baronetcies devolved upon Sir James Stuart, of Allanbank, Bart.; but as Sir James Stuart has left no issue, the three Baronetcies become extinct

THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN, AND SYSTEM OF RAILWAY GRATUITIES. The Directors of the London and North-Western have come to a determination entirely to exterminate the system of solicitation on the one hand of their servants, and on the other hand of overtures on the part of passengers of gratuities at the various termini. They state that it having been reported to them that, notwithstanding their orders to the contrary, and the punishment that has attended the imposition, some persons in their employ have accepted gratuities, while they regret that any of these servants should have disobeyed so wise-known and peremptory a rule, they repeat, alike for the information of the public and all classes of their servants, that immediate dismissal will in all cases follow disobedience to the regulation, and that the excuse that a gratuity is offered, or even pressed upon the servants' acceptance, will have no weight whatever.

READING THE SENTENCE UPON THE ASSASSINS OF GENERAL BREA.

THE PRISONERS AT VINCENNES.

On Tuesday week, M. Béranger, the President of the High Court of Justice, proceeded to Vincennes to interrogate the prisoners confined there, and to receive their declarations preparatory to their trial at Bourges.

The interview of M. Béranger with Barbès, which our Artist has represented, is thus described in a letter in Le Peuple:—

"Citizen Editor,—We are decidedly to have a second edition of the trial of April. To-day, between 1 and 2 o'clock P.M., M. Béranger de la Drôme, President of the High Court, came to interrogate for the last time the prisoners of Vincennes. I of course refused to reply a single word, and would not even tell him my name, as I did not recognise the jurisdiction he represented, and as I am determined to suffer sentence to be passed on me without making any defence. But when he invited me to select an advocate, I declared that when I expected to be tried by a Jury my intention was to choose as counsellors two of my friends—Martin Bernard and Quignot, my companions in captivity at Mount St. Michel, and the witnesses, as it were, of my political life; and although no defence was possible before the High Court, I was thinking, nevertheless, of bringing with me those two friends to Bourges. To this M. Béranger replied with greater urbanity in manner, but with the same feeling, no doubt, which formerly animated M. Pasquier, that if I did not choose other defenders, he should be obliged to appoint an advocate ex officio. The reasons assigned to justify this violence offered to my will are, that Martin Bernard, being a representative of the people, and no lawyer, the Court would be deprived of all control over him. Such a doctrine is intolerable. For my part, I protested against it, and requested that M. Boinvilliers, whose name the President nevertheless inscribed on my dossier, should not take the trouble to proceed to Bourges, as I was determined to refuse his services. I hope M. Boinvilliers will not accept. Everybody minded

HABENECK.

DEATH has just removed one of the greatest musical illustrations of the age. Habeneck is no more; the founder of the Société des Concerts, known to musical Europe as the famed Conservatoire Concerts held in the Salle Bergère in Paris, where German classical music was first heard in the perfection of orchestral ensemble. Habeneck's fame was not so much acquired as a violinist, although he was one of the first of his class, nor as a composer, albeit he has written divers concertos nocturnes, caprices, fantasias, polonaises, quatuors, &c.; but it was in the revolution he has effected in orchestral execution, by his admirable training and conduct of bands, that Habeneck's glory has been gained.

François Antoine Habeneck, the eldest of three brothers of that name, was born at Mezières on the 1st of June, 1781. Son of a German player in a military band who was in the French service, he was taught by his father the violin, and at ten years of age was heard in public as a concerto performer. After wandering with his father from garrison to garrison, Habeneck settled for some years at Brest, teaching, studying, and composing, until he went to Paris, at the age of twenty, and entered the Conservatoire as a pupil of Baillot. In 1804 he gained the first prize as a violinist; and the Empress Josephine was so struck with his talents that she bestowed a pension on him of £48 per year. Soon after he became a member of the orchestra of the Opéra Comique, subsequently joined the Académie, and, in due course, when Kreutzer became director of the orchestra, was named principal violin, and director of the Conservatoire Concerts, at which he was the first to introduce Beethoven's Symphonies. In 1828 he organised the new Society of Concerts whose fame is European as the Conservatoire Concerts, and it was in these programmes he introduced year after year, the grand instrumental works of Beethoven. From 1821 to 1824 Habeneck was Director of the Académie Royale; he then succeeded Kreutzer as chef d'orchestre, and was named, at the same time, Inspector-General of the Conservatoire. Since the Revolution of July, 1830, he held both these offices, with the addition of first violin in Louis Philippe's private band until the last two years, when his increasing infirmities compelled him to resign the direction of the orchestras of the Conservatoire and of the Académie Royale (now the Théâtre de la Nation) to M. Girard, the present chef.

Habeneck died somewhat suddenly, last Friday (Feb. 9th), at the age of 68, leaving a widow and two daughters, one of whom is married to Lepâtre, the flautist. He was buried on Monday last, the funeral service (Mozart's "Requiem") being performed at the Church Notre Dame de Lorette. The Société des Concerts, of which he was the founder, in honour of their deceased director, postponed their third concert, which was to have been given on Sunday the 18th instant; and the entire orchestra and chorus, with the most distinguished professors and artistes in Paris, Meyerbeer, Halévy, Auber, Thomas, Berlioz, Allard (Habeneck's favourite pupil, one of the greatest violinists of the day), Stephen Heller, Girard, Tilmont, Offenbach, Duprez, Mario, Mdme. Pauline Viardot, Madame Dorus Gras, Madame Castellan, Clapisson, &c., were present at the funeral service.

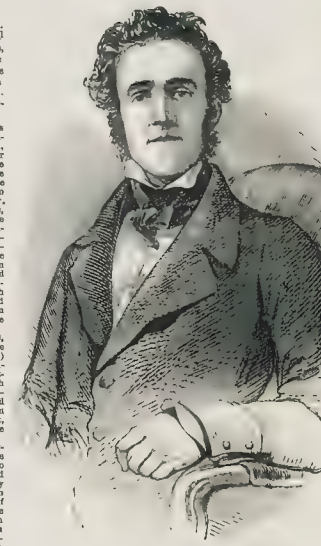
Habeneck, having had solely the organisation and direction of the Conservatoire concerts, brought the execution of the symphonies and overtures of the great masters to a pitch of unparalleled perfection. To obtain admission to these concerts was indeed a treat; the subscription list was always filled, and amateurs had to wait sometimes for years for a vacancy. The fire and energy of Habeneck's conducting, his observance of rythmical time, and the precision and finish which he obtained from his forces, have led to the improvement of the other great orchestras in Europe; and to Habeneck's colouring may be ascribed the perfection afterwards attained by the Leipsic band, and by our own Philharmonic orchestra. The dazzling brilliancy of the stringed instruments in the Conservatoire band, perhaps, has never been equalled—certainly never surpassed. Habeneck had the extraordinary faculty—in which he has had no successor as yet but Costa—of communicating his own feelings to his troops, inspiring them with his zeal, encouraging the timid, rebuking the too daring, rousing the sluggish; and, by thus being identified with the executants, giving to the work under interpretation the charm, truthfulness, and intelligence, as if the spirit of the composer himself were animating the masses.

Habeneck has founded a great school of violinists, of whom Sainton, now one of our resident professors, may be mentioned as a remarkable instance, as well as the great Allard, and Sainton, named by the Committee of the Royal Academy of Music chief professor of the violin, is now transmitting to the English pupils the traditions of the Conservatoire orchestra, so that we may see in our future bands the bows of our violinists moving with a mechanical consent, and not used, as in the olden time, in fantastic and contrary motion. Unity and coherence were the distinctive qualities of Habeneck's system.

The likeness which our artists have given is taken from a group of distinguished violinists. The writer of this notice asked Habeneck for his portrait, and the professor gave him the group, in which his face appears in the centre. "But I should like to have your portrait singly," I observed. "Oh," replied Habeneck, "this will do. I am in such good company, that I should be loth to part with them."

He was a simple-minded, kind-hearted man, and a thorough lover of art.

THE LATE M. HABENECK, OF THE GRAND OPERA AT PARIS.



MR. GEORGE THOMPSON, M.P. FOR THE TOWER HAMLETS.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

GEORGE THOMPSON, ESQ., M.P.

Of the various classes into which our public men may be divided, there is none whose course of political action is more distinguished by intense vitality than that which may have constituted themselves the "apostles of agitation." Adroitly availing themselves of the old and almost immemorial English custom of "public meetings," they have through their means organised a system for the propagation and attainment of political doctrines and objects which, appealing to the court of public opinion, has been able to influence the councils of statesmen and of Legislatures. In these assemblies, characterised by order and respect for the law, and thereby presenting so marked a contrast to the tumultuous and anarchical "Clubs" of the Continent, they interpret the popular will, and through them the "voice of the people," trumpeted in unfaltering tone, commands the attention of Cabinets. It is in this active body of political missionaries, so characteristic of English political life in the 19th century, that the subject of this notice takes no inconsiderable rank as a public man. Springing from that section of the middle classes of the people, which, if not denominated humble, certainly comes not under the category of opulent or exalted, Mr. George Thompson is the artificer of his own fortune, whatever that may ultimately become, for at present he is but in the prime of life.

The hon. gentleman was born at Liverpool, on the 16th of June, 1804, and, at two years of age, left his native town to accompany his parents, who came to settle in London. From the limited means of his father, the young George was unable to obtain any other education but that which the instruction given by his father afforded; but that was by no means meagre, for his parent was a man of studious habits and extensive reading, and under his guidance the future M.P. acquired a taste for literature which laid the foundation of that self-taught improvement and cultivation of good natural parts to which he owes his present comparatively distinguished position. From the early age of twelve years to the time of his marriage, in 1831, with Anne Erskine, daughter of the Rev. Richard Spry, a minister in the Countess of Huntingdon's congregation in Cornwall, and subsequently an Independent clergyman in Sussex, Mr. Thompson continued to hold various situations as counting-house clerk in the city; but his labours in that sphere did not prevent his devoting his leisure evening hours in debating societies, to the development of that talent for discussion which has made him so popular as a speaker at public meetings. The question of Negro Emancipation formed a not infrequent theme of debate on those occasions, and his advocacy of the humane and just side of the question was looked upon as so clever and convincing, that his reputation began to spread, and shortly after his marriage he was invited by the London Anti-Slavery Society to undertake a tour for the purpose of bringing the objects of the society more fully before the public, through the medium of public meetings and lectures. Success attended his efforts so much to the satisfaction of his constituents, that, on his return to London, after an absence of three months, he was solicited to visit the principal cities and towns in the north of England, and he accordingly renewed his engagement. The West India party, alarmed at the influence acquired by the Anti-Slavery Society, selected Mr. Borthwick, the late member for Evesham, as the advocate of their cause, and instructed him to follow George Thompson wherever he might go.

The discussions of those opposing champions in Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, attracted much attention at the time, and Mr. Thompson was generally considered to have borne away the palm of success.

In the carrying of Lord Stanley's Abolition Act, in 1833, George Thompson entertained the idea of qualifying himself for the English bar, but relinquished it in favour of a mission to the United States for the purpose of aiding the infant cause of Abolition of Slavery in that country.

During 1834 and 1835 he lectured as an Abolitionist in Boston and other places in the United States, with much effect, and was frequently exposed to the dangers of Lynch-law, so obnoxious had his anti-slavery lectures made him to

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE FISHMONGERS' COMPANY'S ALMSHOUSES, NEWINGTON, SURREY.

EVERY one who has journeyed from out the metropolis, by the Surrey and Sussex road, will recollect a large area of ground nearly facing "the Elephant and Castle," at Newington, which has, for upwards of three centuries, been occupied by a range of buildings, provided out of the coffers of the Fishmongers' Company as a haven for such of their brethren as fall into decayed circumstances. It extends to the maintenance of forty-two poor men and women, free of the Fishmongers' Company, appointed by the Court of Assistants.

This group of Almshouses is named St. Peter's Hospital, and was originally erected at the Company's charge, and supported out of their revenues, but, in 1665, Sir Thos. Hunt gave by will, out of his land in Kent-street, Southwark, £20 a year, on condition that the Company built a hospital for their poor. This was accordingly done, and the funds were greatly increased by subsequent endowments and gifts. By and by, in 1719, a generous benefactor to his race, one James Hulbert, gave all the residue of his personal estate to the Company, amounting to upwards of £2000, with which they built twenty almshouses, and endowed the same. Thus was completed the Fishmongers', or St. Peter's Hospital: it consists of three courts, with gardens in the rear, and has a dining-hall and chapel—the whole enclosed by a low parapet wall. The old hospital has gabled fronts, and stone mullioned windows. Mr Hulbert's buildings are more modern. The chapel has a bell-tower, and over the gateway are the arms of the Fishmongers' Company sculptured in stone. The Hall has likewise some painted glass, and fine carved work. We have engraved the chapel, as a memorial of the locality, as we understand the almshouses are to be shortly taken down, and rebuilt upon some more airy site, so completely has this spot at Newington become environed with brick and mortar. In this change the statue of Mr. Hulbert, which is now in the Hospital gardens, will, doubtless, be removed with grateful care.

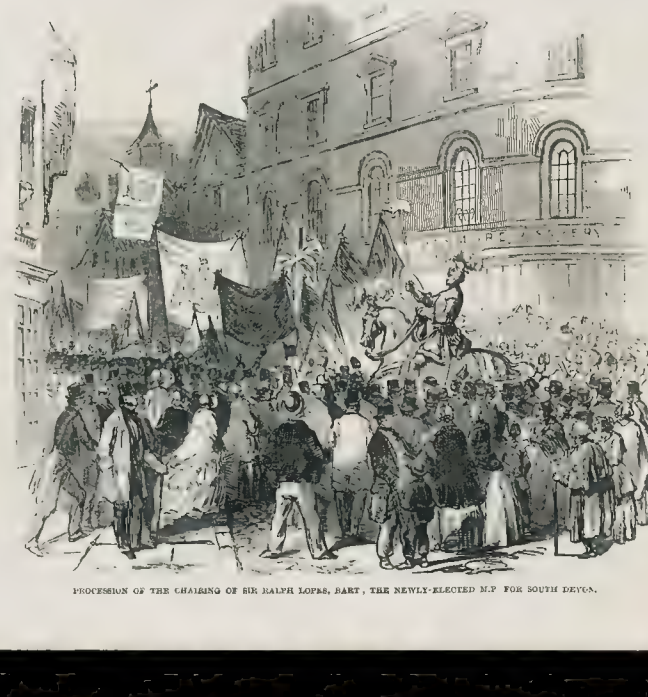
Maitland has a curious record of this locality. He tells us that "on the west side of Hunt's, or the Fishmongers' Almshouses, is a moorish-ground, with a small water-course denominated the river Pyppa, which is part of Cruit's Trench—the outflux of which is on the east side of Rotherithe parish, where the great wet dock is situate." Now, in the year 1823, when the road between the Almshouses and Newington church was dug up for a new sewer, some piles and posts were discovered, with rings for mooring barges, &c.; and also a tin pot, containing coins of the reign of Charles II and William III. An old parishioner, named Farns, who died at the age of 109 years, in the early part of the present century, often said that he remembered when boats used to come up as far as the church at Newington. We find this piece of reminiscence in the "New History of Surrey." A stone inserted in the front wall of the Hospital, also, bears an inscription commemorative of the above trench.

DISCOVERY OF ANTIQUE JARS.—Last week, as some labourers employed upon the Stour Valley Railway were deepening a ditch upon land purchased by the company of Mr. Puttitt, of Mount Bures, they discovered, about five feet from the original surface, three amphoræ—vessels used by the ancients for holding wine, oil, honey, &c. They are about three feet in height, with a small neck, and handle on each side of the neck, and the vessel terminates at the bottom with a point, which was let into a stand or stuck in the ground, so that the vessel stood upright. These found are made of clay, which appears to have been imperfectly burnt. One of them was taken out perfect, the second was deprived of one handle and its pointed foot, the third was broken in pieces in the removal. An iron instrument with three prongs, two of which had knobs of brass on their points, was found at the same time.



PROCESSION OF THE CHAIRING OF SIR RALPH LOPES, BART., THE NEWLY-ELECTED M.P. FOR SOUTH DEVON.

the mob, who erected a gallows at his door, and offered a reward for his abduction. He returned scathless, however, to England, in 1836, when a sum of £1800 was subscribed by his friends as a testimony of their admiration for his conduct.

At a subsequent period he turned his attention to the subject of the improvement of the condition of the natives of British India; and, on the formation of the British India Amelioration Society, under the auspices of Lord Brougham, he was appointed its honorary secretary, and, in that capacity, delivered a series of lectures throughout the country, "On the condition, resources, and prosperity of British India, and the duties and responsibilities to its justice to that vast empire."

These lectures were very effective in attracting the attention of the cotton manufacturers to the advantages which lay undeveloped in the great Indian Peninsula; but when hopes of success were highest, the society fell to pieces, in consequence of internal dissensions, caused in a great measure by the vexed question of the "opium trade" with China.

In 1841, Mr. Thompson became one of the luminaries of the Anti Corn-law League; [illegible] and, [illegible] attention to India, which country he visited in 1843; and on his return to England, after a short absence, he qualified himself to become a member of the Court of East India Proprietors, where he became conspicuous as the advocate of the claims of the late Ex-Rajah of Sattara.

The honourable gentleman's lectures have been published in volumes. He was an unsuccessful candidate for Southampton in 1843. His political creed is "Radical."

SOUTH DEVON ELECTION.

The Election of a Knight of the Shire to serve for the Southern Division of the County of Devon in Parliament, in room of the Hon. Lord Courtenay, who has resigned his seat, took place on Tuesday, at the Castle of Exeter, where a spacious hustings for the accommodation of persons interested in the proceedings was erected in front of the Sessions House.

John Sillifant, Esq., High Sheriff of the county, was most punctual in his attendance; and immediately afterwards, Sir Ralph Lopes, Bart., entered the yard, accompanied by a numerous and influential body of electors, both from the neighbourhood and city of Exeter, and from the distant districts of the Southern Division of the county; amongst whom were Sir T. D. E. Drake, Bart., George Strode, Esq. (proposer and seconder of the candidate); Sir J. T. Buller, Bart.; Sir John Duckworth, Bart., M.P.; Sir E. Prideaux, Bart.; Sir John Kennaway, Bart.; Sir F. Rogers, Bart., &c. The High Sheriff took his station in the centre of the hustings; on the left of him was Sir Ralph Lopes, Bart., whose friends entirely filled the hustings. The windows of the Castle-house above were filled with ladies, amongst whom were Lady Rolle and a large party. The vast area of the Castle Yard was covered with electors and other good-wishers of the Conservative cause.

John Luidman, Esq., called for three cheers for Sir Ralph Lopes, which were heartily given. After the customary preliminary proceedings, the High Sheriff briefly addressed the assemblage.

Sir Thomas T. F. E. Drake, Bart., at the close of an address which was received with much applause, proposed Sir Ralph Lopes, Bart., of Maristow House, Devon, as a fit and proper person to represent the southern division of the county in the Commons House of Parliament, and the nomination was seconded by George Strode, Esq., of Newnham.

Mr. Tuckett, amidst much noise and confusion, then addressed the meeting, and concluded by asking the hon. candidate whether he would vote in favour of the abolition of Jewish disabilities, in order that Baron Rothschild might take his seat in Parliament; and whether he would endeavour to reduce taxation.

Sir R. Lopes said, he considered Protestant Christianity to be an essential part of the Constitution, and sooner than go to Parliament to break into that principle he would retire from the hustings. In reply to the second question, he said he would. He was one of those members who, in 1816, voted out the ten per cent. property tax. Sir R. Lopes then addressed the electors at some length. He was a lover of peace, and his policy was that of non-interference. He objected to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church on religious grounds, and saw no reason in a social and political point of view, for the question being entertained. He would give the utmost toleration to all religions, but would not agree to place other persons on the footing of the Established Church. He considered the Poor-laws in their infancy, but would be happy to join in any measure to diminish rates; but at the same time would vote for an increased amount of relief to those whom poverty made destitute. (Cries of "No, no.") He should hold it his duty to benefit his fellow-countrymen first, and afterwards do all the good he could to other nations. He now came before the electors, but he trusted he would lend himself to no such proceeding. With respect to the Navigation Laws, he would never vote for their repeal. He had no doubt his opinions were in accordance with those of the great majority of his constituents, and by acting upon them he should best serve their interests.

The assemblage was then addressed by Charles Bird, Esq.; after which the High Sheriff put the question whether Sir Ralph Lopes should be returned as one of their representatives in Parliament, and there being only five hands held up against him, Sir Ralph was, amidst loud cheers, declared duly elected.

A vote of thanks to the High Sheriff was then passed, and acknowledged.

The newly-elected member, with the Sheriff and officers, then retired within the Castle, where Sir Ralph was girt with the sword, and the spurs placed on his heels. This completed, he came out into the Castle-yard, where a fine horse appropriately caparisoned stood waiting for him; and mounting this, the Special County Court was dissolved, and a procession formed of the friends of the member, having also that ancient appendage to processions of this description here, the "Blue Man," and with music, and flags and banners, proceeded through the principal parts of the city and St. Thomas, returning to Pratt's London Inn, where dinner took place to celebrate the event.

The procession presented a partial revival of the olden pageantry. The "Blue Man" is a figure upon a white horse, clad in dress of sky-blue velvet, fashioned somewhat after the style of armour; the horse being caparisoned in blue.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1849.

The Ministerial measure of last session for the repeal of the Navigation Laws has been amended in one important particular during the recess. The measure of 1848 proposed that the coasting trade of Great Britain should be protected as before, but that any vessel might bring any cargo from any foreign or colonial port to any port of the United Kingdom. It was forbidden, however, that the foreign or colonial vessel, after unlading part of its cargo at the port of entry, should proceed to a second or third port to discharge the rest. The measure, as amended by Mr. Labouchere, and brought before the House of Commons on Wednesday last, carries out the principle of Free Trade to a fuller extent. It still preserves a portion of protection to the coasting trade, but allows the foreign or colonial vessel to deposit any portion of its cargo at the port of entry, and to proceed with the remainder to another port. As a waste of freight might occur by the sailing of a vessel with only a portion of cargo from one British port to another, foreign vessels may complete their cargoes at the first port, and dispose of them in the second. For the more effectual protection of the revenue against smugglers, the liberty of carriage granted under these conditions to foreign or colonial vessels will be restricted to vessels above a hundred tons burden. Such, in few words, is the measure for the repeal of the Navigation Laws which Government has brought forward; and upon which, if we may judge by present appearances, the old and obstinate battle of Free Trade against Protection will be fought with undiminished animosity by the respective champions of each cause. A preparatory skirmish took place on Wednesday, when Mr. Herries, as Protectionist leader, announced his intention to give the measure his most strenuous and determined opposition. By mutual consent, however, leave has been given to bring in the bill, with the understanding that no further discussion shall take place until the second reading. In the meantime, the measure is left for the study of honourable members, and for the consideration of the country generally.

A very important measure has been introduced to Parliament by the honourable member for West Surrey, under the title of a "Bill to facilitate the Transfer of Real Property." We trust that its introduction by an independent member of the House, unconnected with the Government or with the legal profession, will not prejudice the subject in the estimation of the House or the country; and that, if the bill of Mr. Drummond be insufficient for the object in view, the attention of those who may be better able to deal with it will be immediately directed to the remedy of a very great defect in our social arrangements. Mr. Drummond proposes to establish a general registry of deeds of land, to be accompanied in all cases by a map, and a registration of all incumbrances of every sort and kind upon every landed estate in the country. He does not propose that the registration should be compulsory. The Solicitor-General has given his consent to the principle of the bill, and has promised his assistance in carrying it out, without pledging himself, however, to the support of the details of a non-professional member. Leave has been given to introduce the bill; and we expect, after the promise of the Solicitor-General, that on the first or second reading we shall hear something further of the very great difficulties in which the honourable and learned gentleman represents the subject to be involved; and learn, at the same time, what are the remedies which his experience in framing would suggest for a bill of the kind. The existence of the present system of real property which is a disgrace to a civilised country. It will be remembered that the Real Property Commissioners devoted their second Report to the subject of a general registry of deeds, and that they unanimously recommended the establishment of a General Public Register for England and Wales of all deeds and instruments affecting land, in order to secure titles against loss or destruction, on the fraudulent suppression or accidental non-production of instruments. A bill, embodying these and various other suggestions of the Commissioners, was introduced in the session of 1846, and afterwards dropped.

In some parts of England, in Yorkshire, we believe, in the Bedford Level, and in the county of Kent there is already a partial facility for the registration of deeds; but, owing to the want of indices, and other defects in the machinery, the registrations do not answer the purposes for which they were instituted. It has often been the subject of wonder to intelligent foreigners, that a country so advanced as England should be so far behind in a matter of so much importance; nor has the wonder been diminished when they have been informed that in the northern division of the kingdom a general registry has long been established, and found to answer admirably all the purposes of its institution. The Register Office at Edinburgh is in every respect a credit and an advantage to Scotland; and, for our own parts, we must confess to the belief, that, if our law advisers were really in earnest, they would find means to give the southern division of the kingdom, in spite of all the difficulties in the way, the advantages of a similar system. Even Ireland is ahead of England in this respect. In the United States of America, and in our own colonies, there is a general registration of estates and of incumbrances upon them; and France, Sweden, Italy, Belgium, Holland, and many of the German States, possess systems of registration, complete and efficient enough to afford us models to go upon, if not to shame us for our apathy and neglect. Ever since the days of Oliver Cromwell the subject has been broached from time to time, but nothing has ever come of it, except for Scotland and Ireland. We have yet to learn what peculiarity exists in England which should prevent registration from being as easy, as effectual, and as advantageous for all parties—whether they be owners, or buyers and sellers, of landed property—as it is in those divisions of the Empire. It may, possibly, be inconvenient to some persons who possess estates, and who wish to borrow money upon them, to allow the public to know the full extent of the incumbrances already existent upon them; but the commercial country, where fair dealing between man and man is the rule, and where public rests upon private honour, we do not see that the feeling of such parties ought to stand in the way of a reform in other respects so just and so essential. We could have wished that the Solicitor-General had himself introduced a measure having the object of Mr. Drummond's bill; but the promised assistance of the honourable and learned gentleman will, possibly, lead to the elaboration and success of an efficient system of registration. Such a result would add lustre even to the name of Romilly.

The "Tyranny of Paris," on which we ventured to make some observations in a recent number of this Journal, has been the theme during the week both of the Parisian journals and of the National Assembly. The subject was broached by Marshal Bugeaud in addressing the National Guards of Bourges and Lyons. The Marshal is not famous for tender deeds or for soft words, as those who remember his Algerian razzias, or his threat that he would "mitrailler la canaille" of Paris, will admit. In the spirit of this last-mentioned expression, he has lately been addressing threats to the faubourgs of Paris, that the departments of France would no longer tolerate the insolent domination of the scum of the capital. The words were intended for Paris, though addressed to the armed men of the National Guard of Lyons and Bourges; and the cordial manner in which they were received—ill-judged and intemperate as they may have been—shows that the industrious people of the French departments are fully aware of the tyranny under which they have long suffered, and that they are fully determined, should occasion serve, to submit to it no longer.

The Correspondent of a morning contemporary corroborates the views we expressed some weeks ago. He states that the "silent deference and slavish submission which have hitherto been given to all and everything that emanated from the revolutionary centre, begin to give way to a firm determination no longer to receive the law from the capricious despotism of the capital. The Councils-General deliberate freely upon the necessity of decentralization, and of the government of the provinces by the provinces. Questions of merely local interest are replaced by others of a more general character; and the line of conduct that ought to be pursued in the event of a new revolutionary crisis begins to agitate the provincial population." Marshal Bugeaud is not considered a man of the army and Bugeaud are quite prepared to regress any new attempt at insurrection; and that the provinces are quite as ready for the task as these Algerine commanders.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

RETURN OF THE COURT TO LONDON.

On Monday the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the younger members of the Royal family, and attended by the Viscountess Jocelyn, Hon. Miss Cavendish, Hon. Miss Macdonald, the Earl of Listowel, &c., arrived at Buckingham Palace from Windsor. In the evening her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance of the French Plays with their presence.

On Tuesday afternoon, at one o'clock, the Queen held a Privy Council at Buckingham Palace. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert; the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord President; the Earl of Minto, Lord Privy Seal; Lord John Russell, First Lord of the Treasury; Sir George Grey, Secretary of State for the Home Department; Viscount Palmerston, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Earl Grey, Secretary of State for the Colonies; the Earl of Carlisle, Chief Commissioner of the Woods and Forests; the Earl Fortescue, Lord Steward; the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Chamberlain; and the Duke of Norfolk, Master of the Horse. Thomas Wyse, Esq., was, by command of the Queen, sworn of her Majesty's Honourable Privy Council, and took his place at the board. Her Majesty kicked the list of Sheriffs for the present year. The Hon. William Bathurst was the Clerk of the Council in Waiting. The Queen gave audiences to the Marquis of Lansdowne and Lord John Russell. The Court was afterwards held by the Marquis of Londonderry, Gold Stick in Waiting; the Earl of Listowel, Lord in Waiting; the Treasurer of the Household, the Vice-Chamberlain, and the Comptroller of the Household. Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Seymour, visited the Duchess of Gloucester during the day at Gloucester House. The Marquis of Breadalbane and Lord George Lennox had the honour of dining with her Majesty in the evening at Buckingham Palace.

On Wednesday, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Seymour, equerry in waiting, honoured the Royal College of Surgeons, in Lincoln's-inn-fields, with a visit.

In the evening, Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance at the Lyceum Theatre with their presence. The Royal suite consisted of the Countess of Charlemont, Hon. Miss Cavendish, the Earl of Listowel, Lord Alfred Paget, and Colonel Seymour.

Diplomatic Changes.—It is rumoured in the diplomatic circles that several changes among the diplomatic servants of the state are in contemplation. On dit that his Excellency Sir Alexander Malet, the British Minister at the Court of Wurtemberg, is to relinquish that post for another appointment. His Excellency Lord Bloomfield does not return to St. Petersburg to resume the diplomatic functions as British Minister at the Court of the Emperor for some weeks, when Lady Bloomfield will accompany his Excellency.

The Duke of Wellington gave a grand entertainment on Saturday evening at Apsley House, to the Prince of Orange.

The Duchess of Inverness also had a grand dinner at Kensington Palace, in compliment to the Prince of Orange, on the previous day. The Duke of Cambridge (attended by Baron Knesebeck), Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Countess Delawarr, Viscountess Palmerston, &c., were present on the occasion.

The Speaker of the House of Commons gave his first Parliamentary entertainment this session on Saturday last, at his official residence in Eaton-square. As customary at the commencement dinner, the guests of the right hon. gentleman comprised the leading members of the Government in the House of Commons.

Thomas Wyse, Esq., is appointed to be her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to his Majesty the King of Greece.

The Governor of the Ionian Islands.—Some of our contemporaries have recently announced the appointment of Mr. Charles Villiers, M.P., to the government of the Ionian Islands, while others have as confidently contradicted the announcement. The fact we understand to be, that the government of those dependencies, to which is attached a salary of £7000 a year, was offered to the hon. and learned gentleman in the most flattering terms, and that the offer was respectfully declined by him.—Daily News.

Her Majesty will hold a drawing-room at St. James's Palace, on the 22nd of March.

Her Majesty will hold levees at St. James's Palace, on the following days:—Feb. 22, Feb. 28, March 21. All persons having petitions or addresses to present to her Majesty, at the levees, are to write on two cards, with their names, a statement of the object of such petitions or addresses, and the names of the persons from whom they come: one card to be delivered to the page in the ante-room, and the other to the Lord in Waiting or Chamberlain, who will read its contents, at the time of presentation, to her Majesty; and on these occasions no other statement is to be addressed to her Majesty. A deputation to present an address is not to exceed four persons.

We understand that the vacant Garter will be conferred upon Earl Spencer. Times.

Ingenious Work.—We have lately seen a cloth coverlet, seven feet square, bearing 181 figures of men and animals, plants, &c., in cloth, of their natural colours. To give an idea of the labour of the work, we may state that there are 163 pieces of cloth in the figure of a giraffe, and 200 in that of a couch-dog. This curious work of art has been exhibited to her Majesty. The worker is Mr. George Tindal, of 21, Nassau-street, Middlesex Hospital.

Pembroke College, Oxford.—Various additions have lately been completed in Pembroke College, Oxford. The new hall, which forms the western side side of the new court there, is 0 room 74 ft. 8 in. by 27 ft., and 42 ft. high, from the floor to the ridge of the roof. The hall is divided into six bays, one of which, at the extreme east, where the dais is placed, is a little wider than the [illegible] a rib of the roof springs from stone corbels, ornamented with [illegible] the badge of the college, the spaces between the ribs are filled with tracery, and the wall-plate is carved with shields and roses alternately. The roof is surmounted with a lantern, constructed with a view to obtain ventilation. All the windows are to be filled with stained glass, which is to be executed by Messrs. Chance, of Smethewick, near Birmingham. The hall is warmed by a fire-place on the west side, with a carved chimney-piece of Painswick stone, containing the arms of the college; and likewise by an apparatus in the basement, from which a constant stream of temperated air is passed into the body of the hall. The northern end is divided off by an oak screen, surmounted by a gallery, and the whole room is lined by a wainscot panelling, eight feet in height. The northern side of the new quadrangle consists of entirely new buildings, containing a bursary, common-room, lecture rooms, and lodgings for fellows, and sixteen sets of rooms for under-graduates. The whole forms a pile one hundred and sixty ft long. The architect is Mr. John Hayward, of Exeter. Mr. M. Ard.ng, of London, has erected the hall, and restored the east side of the court. Praise is due to Dr. Jenne, the master, and the fellows of the college, for their efforts to improve the college committed to their care.—The Builder.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE.

Professor Sedgwick delivered a lecture, on Monday last, at the Philosophical Society, on the structure of the southern mountain chain of Scotland, compared with that of the neighbouring parts of Cumberland.

Sir Peregrine Maitland's prize for the best English essay on some subject connected with the Propagation of the Gospel, through Missionary exertions, in India and other parts of the heathen world, has been adjudged to Ernest Frederick Fiske, B.A., of Emmanuel College.

The examinations for the Classical Tripos will be held in the Senate-house, commencing on Monday, Feb. 19th, at nine o'clock.

At a meeting of the Master and Fellows of Christ College, on Wednesday last, the vacancy of the Mastership created by the resignation of the Rev. C. Shaw, B.D., was filled up by the election of the Rev. J. Cartmell, B.D., late Fellow and Tutor of the College. Mr. Shaw having resigned within the statutable period, retains his senior fellowship.

Ordinations.—The Archbishop of York intends to hold his next Ordination at York Minster, on Trinity Sunday, the 3rd of June next. Candidates are requested to give three months' previous notice, and to send their papers to C. A. Thiselton, Esq., Minster-yard, York, on or before the 1st of May. All candidates from the University of Cambridge will be required to have passed the Voluntary Theological Examination. The Bishops of Lincoln, Peterborough, and Ripon will hold their next Ordination at their respective cathedrals on the 4th of March next, the second Sunday in Lent.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.—The one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of this venerable society will be observed with peculiar solemnity. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, its President, will preach a jubilee sermon in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, March 8th, when a collection will be made on behalf of the society. The service at St Paul's will commence at a quarter past three. The clergy in their robes are requested to assemble in the Cathedral at a quarter before three o'clock, to receive his Grace.

Cathedral of Fredericton.—The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has granted a second sum of one thousand pounds towards the expenses of the Cathedral of Fredericton. The society has also granted two thousand pounds towards a Collegiate Institution at Adelaide.

National Society.—The committee have appointed the Rev. J. G. Lonsdale, of Trinity College, Cambridge, who has been for some time secretary of the Lichfield Diocesan Board of Education, to be secretary of the society.

Sisters of Mercy.—During the last six months some ladies, who had come to Devonport in consequence of hearing of the spiritual destitution of the place, have been endeavouring to establish an orphan home. From the representations which they made, the patronage of the Queen Dowager, the Bishop of Exeter, and that of several of the local clergy was obtained. Their own resources, aided by the contributions of others, enabled them to clothe, feed, and educate several orphans, some of whom were selected from the Devonport Workhouse. Reports, however, soon prevailed, that the religious practices of the ladies savoured more of Romanism than of Protestantism, and the matter being brought under the notice of the Queen Dowager, her Majesty sent the Hon. W. Ashley to Devonport to inquire into the matter. The result of the enquiry induced the Queen Dowager to withdraw her patronage. A paragraph has appeared in the local paper which gives the alleged statement of three of the girls who had been inmates of the asylum, that a cross had been erected, that the ladies bow to it, and wished the girls to do the same; that a picture of the Virgin Mary and Infant Jesus are held in reverence; and that many other observances usual in Roman Catholic societies are practised in the Orphan Home. The Bishop of Exeter has declared his intention of going to Devonport to make a personal enquiry into the subject.

EXTRAORDINARY PRESSURE OF THE ATMOSPHERE.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

It is much to be wished that barometer-makers would take a hint from the present very unusual state of the atmosphere, so as to give a greater range to their instrument, and to extend the graduation of their instruments. At this moment my barometer gives no indication whatever, except what I can ascertain by a pretty accurate guess, measuring by the eye. Perhaps no man living has observed (certainly I have not, after an assertive registering, over a space of 30 years) the atmosphere in a similar condition to what it is at present. The greatest pressure ever indicated by my barometer was 31 inches, and that decree of pressure I have observed but five times during the said period. On Sunday morning the pressure was 31 40 inches; at present (Monday, P.M.) it is 31.3, and diminishing. Yours truly,

R. A. A.

19, Vauxhall-place, South Lambeth, Feb. 12, 1849.

A Correspondent (H. J. B.) writes from Bristol:—

"On Sunday morning last, at the hour of high water, the height of the mercury in the barometer registered 30 55, and continued slowly rising during the day until late at night, when it registered 31 20, being 2-10ths above the range of the ordinary barometer scale. This is an almost unprecedented occurrence.

Insolvent Members of Parliament.—Mr. Moffat, Mr. William Evans, and Mr. Brotherton have prepared and brought in a bill to provide for the exclusion of insolvent members of the House of Commons. The bill provides that if any member, not being a trader, shall be indebted in any sum of money upon any judgment, &c., it shall be lawful for the creditor to apply to the Court in which such judgment, &c. was obtained, to fix a peremptory day for payment. The creditor must give the member six clear days' notice of his intention to make the application, and, if the member shall remain unpaid after the day fixed for payment, the creditor may apply to the Insolvent Debtors Court for an order vesting the estate and effects in the provisional assignee of the estate. The vesting order is to remain in force six months; but, immediately after the expiration of that time, the Insolvent Commissioner must send a certificate thereof to the Speaker, and thereupon the election of the member shall be declared void. In cases where all the creditors are paid or satisfied within six months from the date of the vesting order, it shall be lawful for the Insolvent Court to certify the same to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and, in that event, privilege of Parliament may be retained, and the member may be entitled to sit and vote. The bill is to embrace the United Kingdom.

Mysterious Robbery at St. Pancras Workhouse.—A robbery of [illegible] in silver, and £20 in gold, from the "strong room" of the newly-erected St. Pancras vestry-rooms, adjoining the workhouse, in the King's-road, Camden-town, has been effected in a manner which is surrounded with much mystery. On the afternoon of Thursday se'nnight, Mr. M'Gahey, the clerk to the board, accompanied by his son, a young man about 20 years of age, who acts as a clerk in his office, proceeded, according to his usual practice, to the Bloomsbury branch of the London and Westminster Bank, and brought away the sum of £150 in silver, in three bags, and £50 in notes. Mr. M'Gahey had previously placed the £20 in gold in the south-box, and on their arrival at the vestry-rooms (keeping the notes in his pocket) he went away, leaving his son in the office to count the silver, in which he was assisted by another clerk, Mr. Plews. Mr. M'Gahey, jun., states that when he had counted the money he went into his father's private room, and took from the drawer of the inkstand on the table the key of the "strong room," it being the place in which he was usually kept, as fact known, it is stated, by all the officers of the establishment. Having got the key, he went and deposited the money in the cupboard in the "strong room," locked the door, and put the key back in the place in the inkstand drawer in his father's room. The first discovery of the robbery was on Friday morning, and was occasioned by the demand of the board for money to pay the poor, and the absence of the key of the "strong room" from the drawer of the inkstand. The "strong room" door was found locked, and a duplicate key having been obtained, it was opened, and it was then discovered that the cupboard referred to had been broken open, as also the cash-box therein, and the silver and gold to the amount stated stolen. Information was instantly forwarded to the police-station of the S division in Phœnix-street, Somers Town; and on the arrival of two detective officers, an investigation took place, and the following singular facts presented themselves. In the "strong room" there were no traces of any implements, nor had there been any violence used to the lock of the box or cupboard. The door of the vestry clerk's office was found unlocked, and also that of the private room. The keys of the strong room, that of the door leading from the workhouse garden, besides other keys, had also been abstracted, but were afterwards found in the lavatory rang of in a row, together with several house-breaking implements. On the window-sill were discovered four finger-marks of a dusty hand; but, on minute inspection, the officers are convinced that these had been made from the inside, but were intended to lead to a belief that the robber had made his exit by getting out and dropping from the window, a circumstance rendered impossible with the sum of £135 in silver on his person. Mr. M'Gahey, jun., states that when he deposited the money in the "strong room," he immediately went, after locking the door, and pla.ed the key where he found it, and that left [illegible] premises, the time being, to the best of his belief, about a quarter past six o'clock. There is some doubt which of the beadles locked up the place, but the last person in the vestry clerk's office was Mr. Jacques, the chief clerk, and he, it appears, recollecting, after he had got into the road, that he had not locked the office door, told Lamb, the porter at the gate of the workhouse, to go up and do so, but whilst Lamb was absent through forgetfulness, not thinking, as he states, at the moment, that it was of particular importance, as he had known the vestry clerk's office door to be left unlocked many times before. The last officer known to have been on the premises was Mr. Clarke, one of the visiting agents of the poor, and he is stated to have left by the lower lodge gate, leading to his office on the first pavement. In consequence of this robbery the board of directors had no money to pay the poor, who had assembled in hundreds, and they had to remain till the necessary amount was procured from the banker's by Mr. T. H. Smith, a member of the board, from his own account. A special meeting of the board of directors took place on Saturday afternoon, when an investigation was entered into with closed doors, but from what has transpired suspicion points to some of the officers of the establishment, although everything was done to make it appear to have been the act of a stranger and regular housebreaker. In order to strengthen this view of the case, four or five skeaton keys were thrown into the garden fronting the house, No. 15, Cook's-row, Old St. Pancras-road, about the doors from the front of the vestry-rooms, where they were picked up on Saturday morning, and handed over to Lockerby, the detective-constable, by Mrs. Tabrum, the niece of one of the beadles, who keeps the house, and who almost them here. These keys, on being tried by the officer, were found to open almost every door in the place. The delinquent has not been discovered.

OPENING OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION EXHIBITION.

"PARIS IN 1848."—PAINTED BY F. GOODALL.

The first exhibition of pictures of the London season, in point of time, is invariably the collection at the British Institution. It announces April, May, and the usual period of the London season, much better than the Almanack, or Term Time at Westminster Hall, and is a fair rival, in its seasonable looks, to Covent Garden market. It has always been a popular Exhibition, nor will this, its three-and-thirtieth, we believe, tend to lessen its popularity, or abridge its usefulness. It is, indeed, true that the Exhibition, viewed as a whole, is hardly up to a level of its earlier displays; but it is more than an average Exhibition, and contains many pleasing pictures. The complaints which we have heard, and seen even in print, that only one Royal Academician is an exhibitor, is rather a cheering circumstance in the history of art, for it must be remembered that the British Institution was established not so much for the exhibition as for the sale of works of art, and the purchasers of pictures are now one hundred times as numerous as they were when the Institution was established, in 1806. We have plenty of Sir George Beaumonts now, and it has become almost an impossibility that another picture, of equal merit to Wilkie's "Blind Fiddler," should be sold again for so insignificant a sum as fifty guineas. When the Institution was established, almost the only purchasers of pictures were the nobility and gentry resident in London. Now it is very different; the manufacturers of Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, Bradford, and Birmingham vie with the nobility in the acquisition of works of art, and pay, at times, even more liberally for what they want. Mr. Vernon, who has given so noble a collection of the works of the English school to the British nation was a horse-jobber in South Audley-street, and Mr. Sheepshanks, whose collection of English pictures is quite equal to Mr. Vernon's, was a clothier at Leeds. If there had been less demand for the works of living British artists, the British Institution Exhibition would have been better than it is.

The present collection consists of 514 pictures, and 14 pieces of sculpture, contributed by 356 different artists. The only Royal Academician who contributes is Mr. Lee, the landscape-painter; and the five Associates who exhibit are Messrs. Creswick, Sidney Cooper, Danby, Redgrave, and Marshall. There is a preponderance of landscape; but this was to be expected, considering how important a feature landscape-painting has always been in our school of art, and how popular landscapes are with by far the largest class of purchasers. It would perhaps have looked better for the future advancement of the English school, had historical or figure subjects been more numerous in the exhibition; but we are not to complain if artists prefer painting pictures that will sell, to pictures that critics will praise and few will buy; for what Johnson has said of actors is true also of artists—

> Those that live to please, must please to live.

It is more than possible to live by landscape-painting, and quite possible to starve upon historical subjects.

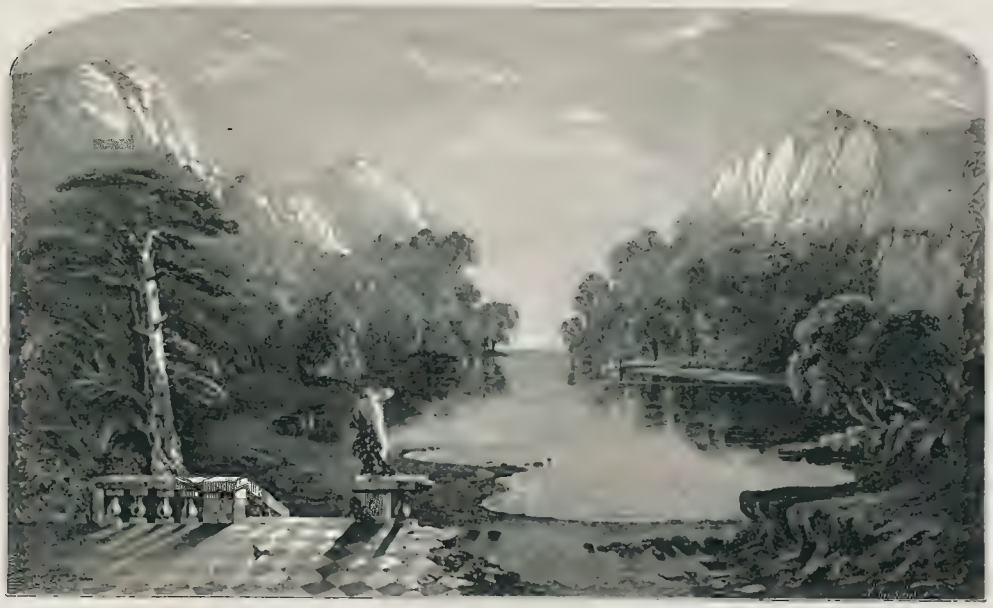
OPENING OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION EXHIBITION.



"THE DESERTED."—PAINTED BY C. BRANWHITE.

The most important contributors to the present Exhibition are, Mr. John Martin, Mr. Lee, Mr. Sidney Cooper, Mr. Creswick, Mr. F. Danby, Mr. Danby, jun., Mr. Marshall, Mr. F. Stone, Mr. F. Goodall, Mr. Branwhite, Mr. E. A. Goodall, Mr. A. Johnston, Mr. Joseph, Mr. O'Neill, Mr. Lance, and Mr. Ansdell. Mr. Martin contributes a large picture of "Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still," a commission, we believe, from a well-known patron of British Art. The incidents and combination of effect are the same as in the large engraving, but the painting is certainly superior to anything which we remember to have seen from Mr. Martin's easel for several years. The distances are admirably managed, and the whole conception brought out in a most wonderful manner. It is perhaps a little too blue. Mr. Lee and Mr. Sidney Cooper work together as before. Their plan is this. Mr. Lee paints a landscape without a single figure in any part of it, and Mr. Cooper puts in the cattle according to his own taste, and with that skill, we may add, for which he is so deservedly distinguished. The result is something like a perfect picture, with a oneness throughout which looks as it should do, anything but like the work of two persons. Mr. Creswick contributes three exquisite landscapes. "The Stepping-Stone," from which we give an Engraving, is in his very best style. This thoroughly English painter always chooses a good subject for his pencil, and never fails to render it with equal truth and beauty. He will understand the high compliment which we pay him, when we call him a better kind of Patrick Nasmyth. Of a very different character from Mr. Creswick's scene in Wales, is "the Deserted," by Mr. Branwhite, of Bristol. This rather ill-chosen title fails to convey the real qualities of the picture. Mr. Branwhite has composed a kind of Ossian's Halloutha, and, in a manner something between Danby and Linton, thrown a melancholy yellow or autumnal grandeur and solitariness over the whole subject. Mr. Branwhite's treatment of this picture (engraved in our present paper) would have suggested to Grainger another stanza for his charming Ode to Solitude.

Among the figure or subject pictures, Mr. Johnston's "Roger and Jenny," and Mr. F. Goodall's "Paris in 1848," are certainly pre-eminent. Mr. Johnston has taken his subject from the "[illegible] Shepherd" of Allan Ramsay, a beautiful Scottish pastoral, which Wordsworth made a point of reading once every year. The passage he has chosen is as follows:—

Roger.—Dear Jenny, I wad speak t'ye, wad ye let;
An' yet I ergh, ye're ay sae scorn'u' set.

Jenny.—An' what wad it [illegible] say if he could speak?
Am I obliged t[illegible]s what ye're to seek?

The grouping (it will be seen from our Engraving) is very nicely managed, and the little incident in this beautiful pastoral drama told with simple earnestness. The execution throughout is good, the faces true to Scotland, and the colouring warmer than Mr. Johnston's usual manner. This really excellent artist should confine himself for a time more strictly than he does to this class of subject. He is more at home in pastoral poetry than in the severer page of English history.

Mr. F. Goodall (to speak metaphorically) was born and bred in the British Institution. He is not a favourite at the Royal Academy; but he is an especial pet, and deservedly too, of the Directors of the British Institution. Here then, his better-class works are always to be found; and here he will continue to find fresh admirers, and command the purses of fresh individuals, so long as he paints pictures of equal merit to his "Paris in 1848" and his "Pet Rabbit." The "Paris in 1848" (engraved in our present Number) provokes comparison with Wilkie's "Newsmongers;" but the treatment, on more careful examination, will be found essentially different. Mr. Goodall's principal figure is a kind of cobbler or barnes-maker who is reading the news of the day to a group of attentive listeners at his shop window. The mother and child in this group are touchingly rendered, and the accessories given throughout with a faithful skill perfectly surprising: the details, such as implements, chairs, pans, pots, &c., are wonderfully true. His "Pet Rabbit" is a perfect little work, worthy of a place in Mr. Hope's collection of Dutch pictures.

We shall continue our engravings from this Exhibition, and what further comments we have to offer, in our next week's Paper.

"ROGER AND JENNY." PAINTED BY ALLX JOHNSTON.

THE THEATRES.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

The official prospectus for the third season, having been presented to her Majesty, has now been issued. Mr. Delafield, the lessee, has secured the services of eminent vocalists and instrumentalists for the effective representation of lyric works by composers of every school; and the company is under the directorship of Mr. Costa.

The prospectus gives a list of works by the great composers, which the directors [illegible] from time to time to present to their subscribers. Amongst these are "Violka, or the Camp of Silesia," of Meyerbeer; the "Fidelio," of Beethoven; the "Oberon" and "Der Freyschütz" of Weber; "Nina in Faenza," and "Otello," of Rossini; the "Lucia," of Halevy; "Il Flauto Magico," of Mozart, &c.

The directors have acted wisely in not pledging themselves to the production of more than four operas; indeed, we think it would have been more politic to have confined their promises to the "Mustie de Portici" and to the "Prophète," the season opening with the former, under the title of "Masaniello," and closing with the latter work having been the subject of a special contract with the gifted composer, Meyerbeer.

The company consists of seven Primi Soprani, namely, Madame Grisi, Madame Doras Grisi, Madlle. Corbari, Madame Ronconi, Madlle. Steffanoni, Miss Catherine Hayes, and Madame Pauline Viardot; two Contralti—Signora Angri and Madlle. Merac; a Seconda Donna, Madame Bellini; four Tenors—Mario, Salvi, Luigi Mei, and Lavia; three Primi Bassi Baritoni Tamburini, Massol, and Ronconi; three Primi Bassi Profondi—Marini, Tagliafico, and Ponsinni; two Second Bassi—Rache and Palamo; and a Secondo Tenore—Soldi: in all, 23 principal singers, with a chorus of 94—forty female, and 54 male voices, and an orchestra of 86 performers. Here is certainly quantity as well as quality.

The greatest new to the Royal Italian Opera is the above list are Mdme. Doras Gras, Miss Hayes, Signora Angri, Mdlle. Merac, and M. Massol. Madame Doras Gras has long been known in this country as a Lucia; but as yet her great dramatic and vocal attainments have not had sufficient development. The successor of Madame Cinti Damoreau at the Grand Opera in Paris, she has "created," as the Frenchmen say, the well make her début on the opening night in "Les Huguenots" and "Masaniello," with Mario.

Miss Catherine Hayes, a native of Ireland, a pupil of Manuel Garcia in Paris, and of Felix Ronconi in Milan, has acquired her fame as a prima donna at the Scala, where she sang with Reeves, and at Naples, Venice, Florence, and before the critical audiences of Vienna.

Signora Angri, who had been for the last two seasons at the Italian Opera in Paris, at the Italian Opera, was recorded in our foreign correspondence. She is only twenty years of age, and her contralto organ is described by those who have heard her to be of extraordinary compass and delicious quality, having that pure and sympathetic tone which at once touches the heart.

M. Massol, the famed French baritone, appeared last season in the part of the Jew, in the "Favorita," singing it on account of the indisposition of Corradi-Setti, at a few hours' notice. He made a considerable impression by this sudden début. He will appear on the first night of the season, March 10, in "Masaniello" as Pietro, a character he sustained at the Grand Opera in Paris with the greatest success. Nevers, in the "Huguenots," and Guillaume Tell, were also his best parts in Paris.

The return of Ronconi will be heartily welcomed, the more so as, independently of his great tragic parts, he will appear in a line of characters new to this country, but in which his continental fame is as great as in his tragic parts as a tragedian. Grisi, whose last season is announced, will play her varied round of parts, and will strengthen the cast of the "Prophète," in which Mdme Viardot will sustain the part she is about to create in Paris. The cast here being rendered complete by Mario, Massol, and Marini being included therein. The visit of Meyerbeer to conduct this opera will be indeed an event. It is the first time he will come to this country in his capacity of composer; and no little curiosity will be provoked to see the composer of the "Huguenots" and "Robert le Diable."

The prospectus intimates that, in compliance with a general wish, the ballet department will be confined to the divertissements incidental to the Grand Operas

Grieve and Telbin are the scenic artistes; Mr. Frederick Gye is acting manager, and Mr. Costa musical director, composer, and conductor.

ST. JAMES'S.

On Monday night, Auber's opera of "Zanetta" was performed for the first time in this country: it was expressly composed for Mdme. Cinti Damoreau, the last season of her engagement at the Opéra Comique: and it was subsequently given for Mdme. Anna Thillon. "Zanetta" is not one of Auber's most popular productions, like his "Muette di Portici" (Masaniello), "Haydée," "Les Diamans de la Couronne," "Fra Diavolo," "Gustave," "Lestocq," "Le Cheval de Bronze," &c.

The libretto, a joint production of Scribe and St. Georges, is such a series of complicated intrigues, that the music almost seems like an interruption to a comedy, replete with ever-changing surprises and events. The first scene is at Pesaro, under the sway of Charles the Sixth of the Two Sicilies, and the contrabbies arise from the political manœuvres of a Bavarian ambassador to obtain the hand of Nanella, the daughter of Prince Cantalupo: the Royal lady being attached to Rodolphe, one of the King's favourites, who, after coquetting being attached to Rodolphe, one of the King's favourites, who, after coquetting with the Princess, fixes his attachment on Zanetta, a flower-girl, she having been saved by her and by her father. Dismissed, Rodolphe in Pris à Mains resigns her pretensions to Rodolphe's hand, and accepts the Elector of Bavaria: and Zanetta thus wins Rodolphe for herself, and a patent of nobility for her father.

The most attractive pieces in this opera are those allotted to the Princess Nanella, sustained by Mdlle. Charton, both in her acting and singing. Mdlle. Guichard's powers were rather over-taxed in the florid music allotted to the Princess Nanella Count's energy and finesse carried him through the part of Rodolphe; it is to be regretted that this admirable actor has so little left of his once excellent tenor voice. The instrumentation is in Auber's happiest vein; but his pretty choruses were not so well done as could be desired.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance with their presence.

We never recollect so prolonged an absence of novelty at this period after Christmas in the play-going world, as at present. We are happy to say, however, that this is a good sign—the attraction of all the old pieces being continuously great, and the reaction in theatricals keeping the managers in high good spirits

The last two or three weeks of the equestrian performances at DRURY-LANE are approaching, the company returning to Paris to commence their season at the Cirque Nationale. M. Dejean carries with him the good wishes of all who have been in his employ, for his honourable conduct and courtesy; all who have been in his employ, for his honourable conduct and courtesy; all who have hailed the rider and clever agility of his troupe have been themes of universal conversation with the amusement-seeking public.

THE HAYMARKET we have elsewhere spoken of. There does not appear to be any necessity for changing the present cast of entertainments for some time to come.

The same remarks will apply to the LYCEUM, which elegant theatre was honoured with the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert on Wednesday evening. How much longer "Who speaks first?" "The King of the Peacocks," and "An Appeal to the Public," will remain in the bills, it is difficult to say; but if the audiences can be accurately proved by the theatre and enjoy these popular pieces as they do at present, we see no reason why they should not form the Easter entertainments

The ADELPHI has substituted the "Green Bushes" for the "Haunted Man," as it appears, "by desire," so that we suppose that there are some who have not seen that effective drama. The "Enchanted Isle" continues to be visited by crowds; and Liverpool may be certainly proud of its production. The piece, by the way, is gaining great popularity in America; and has also been produced at some of our leading provincial houses, with great effect.

As the PRINCESS'S "Bluff King Hal" has far outrun all the pantomimes, and will go for some weeks longer: nothing is undermined, and Mr. Lemoine is evidently the "star" of the theatre just at present.

The STRAND continues closed.

At the OLYMPIC, the old comedy of "The Woman Hater" is about to be revived, adapted to present notions of propriety, and condensed into three acts, by Mr. Spicer. It is many years since this piece was produced, and with the brace the entire strength of the company; and be placed upon the stage with all that care which is evident with the present management.

Mrs. Mowatt and Mr. Davenport are still engaged at the MARYLEBONE. They have appeared this week in Sheridan Knowles' play of "Love;" and the gentleman has acted also in the effective piece of the "Merchant and his Clerks." The audiences at the "Inn" in the "Duck Yard" and at Islington, think it is one. Two or three novelties are in preparation, including a drama and a burlesque.

The SURREY still prospers, as indeed it deserves; but when are we to have one of those dramas which formerly ran their one hundred and fifty nights, and even more, at this house? The novel of "Rattlin the Reefer," very well dramatised, has been brought forward this week, and affords a capital nautical character for Mr. Shepherd, who is very effective in this line. He is ably assisted by Mr. Lyon, Mrs. Ponisi, and Miss Telfer. All the present arrangements of this house broaden the present rules and judgment: the only thing the management will have to guard against will be allowing its productions to become in any way identified with the "suffering servant," or "crime and transportation" class of drama performed in the New Cut. We first had occasion to speak of Mr. Shepherd's admirable tact in putting a piece well on the stage, when he was at the MARYLEBONE; and we hope soon to see fresh evidences of his talent, assisted by Mr. Emery, at this handsome theatre

"King John" is drawing large houses, four times a week, at SADLER'S WELLS. We have already spoken twice of the very commendable manner in which it is performed.

We have thus given a résumé of the different theatres, with the exception of ASTLEY'S, to which we will pay every attention in our next. And we may add that the performances just now, at the CITY OF LONDON theatre, are spoken of generally as very good, and patronised by a superior class of audience.

Mr. Stuart has returned to the London boards, and appeared at the Olympic on Monday, in the "Lost Diamond," a translation of "L'Ecrivain Secret," which has been already played in England as "A Chapter of Accidents." He experienced a very flattering reception; and the new adaptation, which is by Mr. E. Sterling, was entirely successful.

The performances of the Bath and Bristol Amateurs, next week, will be for the benefit of the Infirmaries. The audiences are expected to be both fashionable and numerous; as, by last Monday, all the private boxes were taken, and nearly two hundred seats in the pit circle, the attention to which part of the house has been raised one shilling. All the other prices remain the same. The dresses, which are by Mr. Nathan, of Castle-street, have been all made expressly for the occasion, and those for Richelieu and the Captain of the Watch are exceedingly splendid. The ball at Bath, at which all the amateurs will attend, will be on the Thursday, and not on Wednesday as announced. A large number of London friends accompany the troupe, or join them towards the end of the week.

MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY

The performance of Beethoven's Mass in C, and of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise (Lobgesang), reflected the highest credit on the vocal and orchestral forces of the Sacred Harmonic Society, directed by their admirable conductor, Mr. Costa. Only one fault is to be found with the evening's programme, which was in the selection of isolated pieces, some of which were too feeble and uninteresting to interrupt the two great works mentioned above. A fine orchestra, if never be disturbed by a clock; and even if the Mass and "Lobgesang" did not, in their execution, fill up three hours, better to leave off with two hours and a half of pure glory, than to have an additional half-hour of barren pieralities and unconnected nonentities. The Mass and "Lobgesang" in one night ought to satisfy the most voracious musical appetite

The Mass in C, if not so elaborate and so learned, so grand and so overwhelming as Beethoven's second Mass in D, is more clear and easy of execution, albeit there are still intricacies to dismay amateurs. The noble movements, the "Credo" more than any, were admirably executed, the "Benedictus," was very smoothly sung by the Misses A. and M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey and Bodda.

The Hymn of Praise, first performed at the Birmingham Festival, is modelled on Beethoven's Symphonic Hymn of Joy. Both develops through instrumental and that which is more fully shadowed forth by the voice in the last movements. Both are the joy of the earth—men and brethren revealing in the joys of nature those afforded by sympathy with scenery, by union of relatives, festivals, &c. The Mendelssohnian joy is vocal symphony to the joy of the Christian, first set in their exaction

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY.—On Saturday last the half-yearly meeting was held at the central offices in Lothbury. Reporters were not admitted that the directors had no desire to make the position or prospects of the society known. There is no provision in the company's act, nor those of the telegraph companies in America, to the effect that they shall make their proceedings public, though, in the case of the telegraph companies across the Atlantic, advantage is in nearly every case voluntarily taken of the useful publicity of the press.

THE POPE AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS OF LONDON.—On Sunday last an address, prepared by Dr. Wiseman, Roman Catholic Vicar Apostolic of the London District, and expressive of sympathy and condolence with the sufferings, and attachment to the person of the Pope, was read from the altars of the various chapels in the metropolis; and it was announced that it would lie for signature by the laity on the approaching Sabbath (to-morrow). A collection is also to be made on the same day, the proceeds of which will be transferred to the Pontiff; and it was further stated that addresses and pecuniary assistance would be sent from all parts of England, on the most convenient opportunity, to Gaeta.

ENTERTAINMENT TO LOUIS BLANC AND M. CAUSSIDIERE.—On Tuesday evening the friends and political adherents of these distinguished members of the French National Assembly honoured them with an entertainment at the Whittington Club-rooms, Strand. The company present embraced the names of all the well-known Republicans, Communists, and Socialists, both of the metropolis and of the provinces. After laudatory addresses, in which the speakers enunciated their peculiar views, and expressed their anticipations of seeing, and assisting to bring to pass, a state of "greater freedom" in mind and morals—a revolution in society which would ever be associated with the names of their distinguished guests, M. Louis Blanc and M. Caussidière responded. The company separated mutually pleased with each other.

CITY COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.—SMITHFIELD MARKET.—On Tuesday, at a meeting of the Commissioners of Sewers at Guildhall, Mr Deputy Taylor in the chair, Mr. Elliott moved "that it be referred to the Board of Health (a sub-committee of the Sewers Commission) to direct the officer of health to make special report upon the effect on the health of the citizens of London of Smithfield Market, and the number and occupations carried on thereabout;" but, on a show of hands, the previous question, which was moved by Mr. Godson, was carried, by a majority of 60 to 7. The Court then adjourned.

BATHS AND WASHHOUSES ANNUAL REPORT.—On Tuesday, at a meeting of the subscribers and committee of this institution, held in the Boardroom, in George-street, Euston-square, the second annual report was read. It congratulated the founders and subscribers on the fact that their expectations have to the fullest extent been realised. During 1848 the bathers had been 111,788; washers, dryers, ironers, manglers, &c., 61,690; individuals washed for, 246,760; articles of clothing washed, 3,620,840; making a total since August, 1846, of three millions and a half. The statement of receipts for the year included a balance of 23l 5s. 11d.; donations and subscriptions, 54l2 15s. 10d.; receipts from baths, washhouses, and plunging-baths, 2231 17s. 9d. The expenditure, including a repayment of a loan of 2500, left a balance of 23l 1s. to the benefit of the bankers: the loans and liabilities amount to 2376. To extend the operations for the accommodation of 5000 poor persons weekly, a building for their accommodation is in progress, to which the Queen, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, the Duke of Bedford, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., have already subscribed upwards of 1000.

CHELSEA BOARD OF GUARDIANS AND THE TOOTING CHOLERA CASE.—On Saturday the vestry room of St. Luke's, Chelsea, was crowded by ratepayers, anxious to hear the result of the two days' polling on the resolution exculpating the guardians from the responsibility which the verdict of the coroner's jury attached to them, and on the amendment laudatory of the jury. Mr. Churchwarden Calow announced the following to be the result of the two days' polling—For the amendment (which confirmed the opinion expressed by the jury) 194 votes and 158 persons; against the amendment, 231 votes and 118 persons. majority—of votes, 17 against, and of persons, 50 for, the amendment. The churchwarden then put the original resolution, which was almost unanimously negatived, amidst applause. Mr. Markham, friend of the coroner's jury, Mr. Burton, and other persons, charged the guardians with a breach of faith in voting, after they had promised not to do so

MR. DROUET AND THE PAUPER CHILDREN.—On Monday evening a fully attended meeting of the inhabitants of Westminster took place at the Temperance-hall, Broadway, for the purpose "of considering the lamentable destruction of life at the pauper child farm at Tooting—one hundred and fifty poor children having lost their lives in twelve days—to consider the reprehensible conduct of the Boards of Guardians, and the Poor-law Board, and of the present new Poor-law as opposed to a Christian country." The following resolution was passed:—"That, from the painful disclosures connected with the awful destruction of life at the child-farming establishment at Tooting, from the jury on the inquest relating to the deaths of the innocents in question having returned a verdict of manslaughter against Mr. Drouet, and from the circumstances that the system under which the children's lives were destroyed has, from time to time, met with the approval of the guardians of the poor, and ex-ited under the cognizance and sanction of the Poor-law Commissioners, this meeting considers the inhuman treatment inflicted upon these children to be insupportable from the spirit and essence of the new Poor law, and that this law being repugnant to every feeling of humanity, and a monstrous and enduring violation of the decrees of our holy religion, ought to be altered and immediately abolished." A second resolution, pledging the meeting to adopt petitions to both Houses of Parliament, urging the speedy abolition of the new Poor-law, was also carried unanimously.

THE SALE OF THE STOWE LIBRARY, after having extended over 24 days, was brought to a close on Saturday. ST. MARY-LE-BONE BANK FOR SAVINGS.—From the report read at the Annual General Meeting, held last week, it appeared that no fewer than 2070 new deposits had been made in the last year; 19,019 deposit accounts remained open on the 20th of November last; upwards of 4291,386 was then invested in the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. This amount has since risen to 4326,886 3s 3d.

THE FOG.—LOSS OF LIFE.—On Monday morning, during the dense fog which enveloped the metropolis, the train which leaves the Euston station at 5 minutes past 9 o'clock had just passed the bridge over the canal at the Camden station (the pilot-engine having been turned into a siding the moment before), when it was suddenly raised of "A man down!" and it was discovered a policeman, named Fitzpatrick, had, for some cause as yet unexplained, proceeded to cross the line between the two engines, and was struck down by the engine attached to the train. On reaching the unfortunate object of the alarm, he was found frightfully mutilated, with a deep wound on the head, apparently large enough to admit the whole hand; and the right foot also crushed. He was removed to the University Hospital, where a slight movement of one hand apparently terminated his sufferings. He leaves a wife and large family totally unprovided for. The fog caused great alarm and inconvenience on the Thames.

DISCONTINUANCE OF INTERMENTS AT ST. BRIDE'S BURIAL-GROUND.—On Wednesday, in consequence of a representation made by Mr. Simon, the City of London medical officer, to the effect that the land used by the churchwardens of St. Bride's as burial-ground for the poor was a nuisance prejudicial to the neighbourhood, an order was issued by Mr. Daw, the chief clerk of the commissioners, directing the churchwardens to abate such nuisance, and to discontinue interments in such burial-ground from this time forth.

ST. LEONARD'S, SHOREDITCH.—The Gazette of Tuesday night contains an order from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, stating that certain parts of the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, appear to be affected by a formidable epidemic or endemic disease, and directing the trustees of the poor of that parish to provide such additional daily qualified medical aid, for a period of not less than six weeks, for the visitation of those localities where the epidemic prevails; and this officer is to make a daily return to the clerk of the union of the number of persons he attends.

THE SERPENTINE AND KENSINGTON GARDENS.—The Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, &c. are now draining the Serpentine, prior to the season they are about to resort to removing the stagnant state of the water; and a correspondent of the Builder suggests, very appropriately, that the occasion should be seized of substituting a fountain of some architectural pretensions for the "dado-looker" that at present figures the ornamental water.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AGENTS.—The following notice was issued on Tuesday, by the Commissioners of the Customs:—"Cases having recently occurred where agents have neglected to comply with the provisions of the law, by not endorsing on their licenses the names of individuals acting as their clerks, and also by omitting to have the same duly registered, and also by retaining on their licenses the names of persons who have left their employment, this is to give notice, that should any instance hereafter come to the knowledge of the Commissioners, wherein such neglect has occurred, the Board will take immediate measures to have such licenses revoked."

BIRTHS AND DEATHS, &c.—The births registered in London during the week ending Saturday last, Feb. 10, were 1673; the deaths were 1196; the average for the week being 1169; showing an excess on the winter average of 27; and, as compared with the return of the previous week, an increase of 59. This result, to some extent unfavourable, is the effect of increased fatality of inflammation of the lungs and bronchitis, especially the latter, which, in proportion to the population at each age, carries off a greater number in the City, while the former is fatal, almost exclusively, to the young. The deaths from inflammation of the lungs were 103, or just the average; in the previous week they were 94; those from bronchitis were 94, or 15 more than the average; in the former week they were 79, which is the average number. The readings of both the barometer and thermometer were unusually high. Small-pox, measles, scarlatina, hip ping-cough, all show a decrease as compared with the former returns; but fatal cases of cholera were 55, from which it appears that this epidemic is on the increase in London. It is worthy of observation, that diarrhœa and dysentery number 37, which is considerably more than occurred in any of the first six weeks of five previous years; while the mortality from diarrhœa, dysentery, and cholera together is equal to six times the weekly average.

"Titus." The law on the subject of the fifty moves at the end of the game is too indefinite. We should think, however, it could hardly be called into operation in the case you instance, where "one player has six or seven pieces," and the other "a King and an unqualified Pawn." Half a dozen moves would surely suffice to give the coup de grace.

"W. H. R." *Clifton. The move you suggest in the Muzio Gambit is not at all a bad one; but, having a Piece en prise to his opponent, White's policy is to economize his forces and avoid exchanges. WINTER COSTUMES OF BRITISH TROOPS IN CANADA.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent at Montreal with the very characteristic Sketches, whence the annexed Illustrations have been engraved, of the Winter Costumes of some of the British Troops in Canada. To show the necessity for this peculiarly defensative clothing, our Correspondent subjoins a few notes upon the intense cold of the Canadian climate.

The winters here are very severe, Fahrenheit often being 16°, 18° and 20° below zero. The snow lies frequently four feet in the streets; the St. Lawrence is driven over in all directions; roads are cut or the ice flattened. This river has a most extraordinary appearance from the ce floating down in large masses, until at last the strong current itself becomes frozen, and the ice, jammed in heaps, rises eight or ten feet above the usual level of the river. Everything that comes to market is stiff. All travel in sleighs; and various are the costumes—generally skins, buffalo hides, blankets, and leather coats with hoods. Many people suffer from being frost-bitten; and oftentimes people are pointed at by passers-by in the streets, intimating that some part of the face is frost-bitten, which assumes a white appearance. Snow is immediately rubbed upon the part affected, which generally makes the blood circulate again, after a smart tingling.

REGULATION WINTER DRESS FOR OFFICERS OF THE LINE.

HIGHLAND PIPER.

In case of the soldiers being required on duty up the country while deep snow is on the ground, they are provided with regular Indian snow shoes, something like a very large racket. One entire regiment marched in these from Halifax to Quebec, during the disturbances in 1836.

The frost is so intense, that in one night water freezes many inches: and often the streets are so slippery that it is impossible, in an ordinary way, to walk. Creepers are then used—a small bar of iron at the bottom of the foot, on each side of which there are two teeth to prevent slipping, fixed on with straps to the foot. Without these it is often impossible to walk out at all.

When there has been a good fall of snow, all people wear mocassins over their shoes or boots. Mocassins are leather shoes, generally made from the skin of moose-deer. There are three or four manufactories of these in different parts of Canada, and also in the States. Many are very handsomely worked in front. They are exceedingly warm for the feet, and kept on all day, in and out of the house. The snow here is so dry that these leather shoes never become wet, as they would very shortly in England.

MADEMOISELLE JENNY LIND AT WORCESTER.

ON Friday evening, the 2d inst., a Concert in behalf of the Infirmary took place at the College Hall, Worcester, in which Mdlle. Lind most generously gave her services. All the tickets were taken early. It was the most brilliant affair of the kind that ever occurred at Worcester Mdlle. Lind arrived from London on the previous evening, and, at the invitation of the Dean (Dr. Peel), took up her residence at the Deanery She was welcomed into Worcester by bell-ringing and other popular rejoicing; and the Dean and his lady invited select parties to meet their fair guest.

This additional instance of Mdlle. Lind's benevolence will ever be deeply remembered by the citizens of Worcester. The Concert Committee being desirous of evincing their great obligation to the Swedish Nightingale, proposed to present her with a selection of the choicest specimens of Worcester Porcelain, of a character and style peculiar to Messrs. Chamberlain's manufacture, consisting of a superb collection of Oriental pierced honeycomb work, of classical form and exquisite finish. The views of the committee were, however, frustrated, by a positive but courteous refusal, on the part of Mdlle. Lind, to accept the proffered acknowledgment for her services, which she had resolved should be purely charitable. The nett proceeds of the Concert amounted to about £800, to which extent the charity will benefit.

We have engraved the beautiful specimens of Messrs. Chamberlain's Porcelain. The main peculiarity is, that each vessel is encased in the pierced or honeycomb form, the effect of which is very elegant. The designs are, also, purely original, and the gilding very superb.

AN INGENIOUS ARAB.—Mr. J. R. Gliddon relates, in his lectures on Egyptian Archæology, reported in the Archæological Journal of the past and present month, that "an Arab discovered the northern air-channel of the Great Pyramid to be open from top to bottom, by placing a cat at the outer orifice, and her kittens at the other, shutting them in with stones. The mother soon found her way down, through the pyramid, to her little family; thus proving that this hitherto mysterious passage communicated with the outside. Previous to the clearing of these passages, the air in the pyramid was quite suffocating."

IRON WAREHOUSE FOR CALIFORNIA.

THE incessant demand for goods in the Californian trade has just led to the accomplishment of a feat in British manufacture which merits special record We find the circumstances thus explained in the Liverpool Albion:—"The want of any place to store the goods now going to California, determined Messrs James Starkey and Co., who have a house in San Francisco, to send out the materials for a warehouse. A contract was consequently made with Messrs. T. Vernon and Co. for one to be built of iron, under the direction of Mr. Grantham, civil engineer, of Liverpool. The warehouse is of iron, and the roof is similar to those used at railway-stations. The sides and roof are thin, covered with galvanised corrugated iron plates. There are large folding doors in the centre, and windows in the roof. The order was given on the 5th ultimo; the men were fairly at work on the 9th; and on Saturday, the 3d instant, it was entirely erected, and ready to be taken down; having been constructed in the short space of twenty-three working days."

Our Sketch shows Mr. Grantham's building-ground, with the Mersey, here about one mile and a quarter wide, and the Welch hills in the distance. In the yard, the warehouse is seen just as it appeared the day before it was taken down for shipment for California. As the whole of the iron was galvanised, it was nearly white, and had a singular appearance.

IF OPERATIONS OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—It appears from a paper issued on Tuesday, that the dividends due and not demanded from the directors of the bank of England amounted to the sum of £876,739 on the 5th of April, 1848; to the sum of £876,739 on the 5th of July, 1848; to the sum of £959,095 on the 10th of October, 1848; and to the sum of £1,047,207 on the 5th of January, 1849.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

It is difficult to find a piece better cast, upon the whole, than Mr. Douglas Jerrold's drama of "The Housekeeper," revived for the Royal performances at Windsor, and subsequently produced, with nearly the same cast, at the Haymarket; Mr. Keeley playing Simon Box, instead of Mr. Buckstone. The story is well known: that of a charming girl, Felicia, who takes the situation of housekeeper, under the disguise of a country girl, for the purpose of winning the love of her studious cousin, Sydney Maywood, and leading him from his devotion to philosophy. Mrs. Charles Kean is the heroine, and she invests the rôle with all that grace and unaffected bearing which so characterises every part she undertakes, to which those attributes may more especially belong. Mr. Kean is the student, with not so much to do, but rendering every point of the dialogue with judgment and educated finish; and Mr. Webster's Father Oliver is remarkable for its effective make-up and impressive acting. Mr. Keeley's Symon Box keeps the audience in roars of laughter; and Mr. Wigan, in Tom Purple, manages admirably the always hazardous experiment of representing intoxication, without making a natural picture disagreeable. We should also mention that the Widow Duckhay of Mrs. Clifford, and Scoby Hawser of Mrs. Humby, are two realisations of characters that it does one's heart good to see; nor must Mr. Clark be forgotten, as Rip (the porter).

This revival has been a great piece of fortune for the theatre. It may be interesting to know that, in the first instance, the piece was selected by Prince Albert's especial desire. The houses have been crowded on each night of its representation.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT ON THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY.

A shocking accident occurred on the Caledonian Railway on Saturday night. The mail-train left Carlisle for the North at 9h. 10m. P.M. It consisted of an engine and tender, a first-class carriage, a second-class carriage, a mixed carriage of first and second-class for Perth, three horse-boxes, containing nine horses, for Perth, a first-class and a second-class carriage for Edinburgh, and a horse-box for Beattock

It proceeded without interruption until it passed the Rockliffe station, about four miles north of Carlisle, when suddenly the engine and tender were disseverd from the train, the latter getting off the rails. The first-class carriage for Glasgow also got off the rails. The second-class carriage for Glasgow, the travelling post-office, three horse-boxes, the mixed carriage for Perth, and the Edinburgh first-class carriage were all precipitated down the embankment, 15 feet in height. The second-class carriage was turned on its side; the post-office van ran through its upside down, and shivered to atoms

The greatest consternation prevailed among the passengers, who were rather more numerous than usual. The night being moonlight, the guard, the engine-driver, the stoker, and those who made a safe exit from the carriages, immediately set to work to explore the extent of the disaster. A messenger was despatched on foot to Carlisle; and on his arrival, Mr. Spiers, the superintendent of the station, set out to the spot with a special engine and a party of workmen

In a few hours four men were taken from under the second-class carriage, quite dead, and a fifth seriously injured. They were all placed in a luggage-train which passed from the north soon afterwards, and, with those of the passengers who consented to return, taken to Carlisle. The injured man had had his foot cut completely off. When he was taken to the infirmary, it was found necessary to amputate his leg. He died in the course of the night.

Mr Nixon, yeoman, of Rashburn-hill, was pitched out of the carriage in which he was sitting, and rolled down the embankment into a ditch, where he was discovered by the merest accident. Just before the luggage-train left the scene of the catastrophe for Carlisle, Mr. Mackenzie, of Rockliffe-hall, and his son were a good deal bruised, and were taken to the house of their friend, Mr. T. Clarke, carrier, of the Crescent, Carlisle. Mr. Drummond, one of the Commissioners of the Glasgow Police, was of the number of the injured who were conveyed by this train to Carlisle. Mr. Woodrow, commercial traveller, Manchester, a simple fracture of the right leg, and contusions on the body. Mr. John Hamilton, commercial traveller for Messrs. Stewart and M'Donald, fracture of the fore-arm and severe injury at the hip-joint, besides less serious bruises. Other passengers sustained bruises to more or less extent.

The persons killed were all evidently, from their style of dress, labouring men.

The second-class carriage, which is thought to have been the cause of the accident, is supposed to have been of improper gauge. It belongs to the London and North-Western Company. Three of the horses were saved; seven were killed. Both lines have been thoroughly repaired, and no obstruction is offered to the traffic.

THE LATE COLLIERY EXPLOSION NEAR BARNSLEY.

The inquiry into the cause of the late fatal colliery explosion at the Darley Main Colliery, Worsborough-dale, near Barnsley, was brought to a close on Friday se'nnight, when the Jury returned the following written verdict:—

"We find a verdict of Accidental Death on the 75 bodies we have viewed, caused by one or more explosions of carbouretted hydrogen gas, or inflammable air, which took place on the 4th of January last, in the Darley Main Colliery; and we most strongly recommend to the proprietors that a better system of ventilation be adopted before they re-commence working the mine, as a preventive against any future occurrence of a similar kind; and we think, from the evidence given before us, that the removing of the machinery used for drawing water out of the upmost shaft, is essentially necessary, so as to allow the air passing out of the mine to have a better and freer outlet. And we pray our coroner Esquire that Mr. Badger, the coroner, be requested to report to Sir G. Grey, and that he make such report known to her Majesty's Government, that we think it advisable that they should appoint a scientific and practical person to occasionally inspect the collieries in this district, and see that there is proper ventilation, and hear any complaints by the workmen employed therein.—Joseph Porter, foreman."

The Coroner expressed his full concurrence in, and his satisfaction with the verdict.

A subscription has been set on foot for the 31 widows and the 55 children who have been left in a state of great distress through this awfully fatal explosion The Darley Main Company commenced the subscription with a donation of £200, besides defraying all the expenses of the funerals of the 75 sufferers. Mr. J. Jeffcock, the owner of the coal-field, has contributed £100. On Friday the Rev. J. Andrew, the incumbent of Worsborough, received a handsome donation from the Queen Dowager for £25, and one from the Archbishop of York for £20, in aid of the benevolent object. There is good ground for believing that a concert will be given at Barnsley or some other town in the West Riding, at which Jenny Lind will give her valuable services in aid of the fund now raising. The Leeds Intelligencer of Saturday last says:—"We understand that three gentlemen of Barnsley waited upon Jenny Lind a few days ago in London, at Manchester, to solicit the exertion of her talents at a concert for the relief of the families of the persons killed by the late colliery explosion at Worsborough Dale, and that, with her characteristic benevolence, she has reserved her resolution as to the course upon receiving an invitation from any committee which may be appointed to carry out the truly charitable object."

CARDIGAN BOROUGH ELECTION.—The election for the Cardigan boroughs terminated on Saturday last in favour of the Liberal candidate, Mr. Pryse Pryse, who beat his Conservative opponent, Mr. J. S. Harford, by a majority of eight; the numbers at the close of the poll being Pryse, 239; Harford 231.

SOUTH FORELAND LIGHTHOUSE.—The Honourable the Corporation of Trinity are testing the power of Wells's Patent Atmospheric Railway and Engine Signal. The patentee is now at the South Foreland Lighthouse, adjusting one capable of giving an alarm which may be heard at a distance of three miles. However valuable these well-constructed lighthouses may be, they are of little use if their utility is much lessened, and many vessels have run ashore close in their vicinity, the crew being unable to see them. It is hoped this calamity may now be obviated, by the very useful invention of Mr. Wells.

A CHIMPANZEE.—A rare specimen of the monkey tribe (the chimpanzee) has lately been added to Earl Fitzwilliam's collection of animals, &c., at Wentworth. It was brought to this country from the western coast of Africa, and presented to the noble Earl by a relative, who is a captain in the Royal navy. A well-prepared room in the house is appropriated to its use, having a little domicile in the centre, and warm blankets to repose on, as these animals are extremely susceptible a of cold. Its size is likewise a good fire in the apartment, but will guarded from a too near approach, as the eyes or walks perfectly erect, and is about three feet in height. It uses both hands with great nimbleness, undrawing knots with dexterous ease, handles everything like a human being, and is the nearest approach to the human form, the ears being almost a facsimile, also the bosom, and so on downwards. It is very qui k in detecting any unkindness, and runs immediately to the keeper for protection Its food is choice, and wine a favourite beverage, holding the glass till the contents are disposed of. figs are a portion of its favourite rood. The arms are long, thin, and hairy, and the fingers and nails finely developed. This is considered the finest specimen which has been seen in this country.

NOTTINGHAM.—STRIKE IN THE HOSIERY TRADE.—Never, since the establishment of the hosiery trade in Nottingham, have there been so many men "on strike" as at present; there being about 600 cotton cuffers, and about between 300 and 400 silk-glove hands now unemployed, arising out of disputes concerning wages, and amounting in number to one-twelfth of the able-bodied population of the town and suburbs. The glove hands were formerly of further procrastination, left work in the latter part of last week in great numbers, and, as usual, paraded the town, soliciting the hosiers for an advance of 6d. per dozen, being about 10 per cent, on the gross amount of their wages. Some of the hosiers in the town have acceded to the request, but the principal firm has refused to comply. The silk-glove "turn-out" extends into Derbyshire, where the workmen appear to be more resolute than in Nottingham.—Nottingham Journal PLUNDER OF THE EXETER MAIL-BAG.—The two prisoners, Poole and Nightengale, now lying in the gaol of Exet r, awaited a trial at the present assize, on the charge of having been concerned in the recent daring robberies of the mail-bags on the Great Western Railway, underwent another examination on Friday se'nnight; but nothing of any importance was added to the details already published. The object of the examination was the identification of the prisoners by some persons besides those who have already given evidence for that purpose. After this evidence had been taken, the prisoners were removed to their former place of confinement in the gaol.

ATTACKS BY MISCHIEVOUS MEN.—On Saturday evening, when returning home from Buckingham market, Mr. Lines, of Water Stratford, farmer, was pulled from his horse by three men, and robbed of his watch, about £7 in gold and silver, and a cheque for £30 on the London and County Bank, Buckingham. On pulling Mr. Lines to the ground, his horse reared and put his mouth. He resisted, and knocked down one of the men twice; but by the combined strength and skill of thedacoits, they completely overpowered him. Mr Treadwell, miller and farmer, of Westbury, was on the same evening (when his way home from the above market) stopped near the turn to Shalstone, two men, who fortunately did not succeed in robbing him of his purse. After striking one of the fellows a violent blow across the face with his stick, Mr Treadwell rode off with the loss of his hat and stick only, which was subsequently found in the road.

FORTUITOUS DISCOVERY OF A BURGLARY.—It may be remembered that the rectory at Coombe, near Salisbury, was burglariously entered on the 19th of January last, and a large quantity of plate, a gold watch, writing-desks, work-boxes, and their contents, was stolen. The accused burglar is a chimney-sweep of Wilton, named Stratton, who, on Wednesday, last week, went to Salisbury, to have an interview with a person named Phillips, for the purpose of disposing of about 140 ounces of plate, bringing with him the silver plate, the property of the Rev. Mr. Briscoe, when Mr Phillips gave Stratton into custody. Information was then sent to Mr. Superintendent Hall of Wilton, and a minute and lengthy search of the sweep's establishment was forthwith made: and after some hours, the workhouses and contents, and all the other loose property were discovered fastened up to the roof of the sweep's house. He has been in prison since the trial. One George Andrews was apprehended as an accomplice, but was evidence not implicating him, he was discharged.

THE MURDER NEAR BRIGHTON.—A description has been issued of such of the property stolen from the deceased as it is thought might assist in detecting the murderers. Among the rest was a check on and "crossed to" the London and County Bank, Chichester, drawn by John Bower, and payable to Henry Bowley; a £5 note of the Brighton Union Bank, torn in two and pasted together, No D 4712, dated June 24, 1846, and a flat gold Geneva watch, with a gold chain, plaited black hair, the sheaved hand, with engine-turned back, and part of a table gold chain attached. A subscription has been entered into by the inhabitants of Brighton, in order that no measures, necessary to be taken for the discovery of the murderers, shall, through want of pecuniary means, be left unprosecuted. A reward of £200 has been offered by the Brighton Police Court, for information that may lead to the apprehension and conviction of the murderers. £100 has been subscribed by the inhabitants of the same purpose. The Coroner's jury have returned a verdict of "wilful murder against some persons unknown."

MR DUFFY'S TRIAL.

The Court of Commission in Dublin was compled this week with Mr. Duffy's ff trial.

On Wednesday morning the Judges gave their opinion against a demurrer put in by the prisoner's counsel to the indictment, stating that they considered it to be most correctly drawn in every particular, and in conformity with the act of Parliament, and that it would have been really open to objection if framed as the prisoner's counsel contended it should have been.

Mr. Duffy then pleaded "Not Guilty" and on the motion of the prisoner's counsel, the Jury panel was called over, to enable them to consider what course they should adopt as to challenging. 86 out of 176 jurors answered.

As a subsequent period of the day the prisoner's counsel had not made a challenge to the array, on which the Attorney-General joined issue, and Messrs Andrew, Thomas Rogers, and George Whitte were appointed tryers. The challenge, which was extremely long, was to the effect that the prisoner had been prejudiced if tried by a Jury selected from it, as it was not impartially framed by Mr. W. D Lascuthe, the High Sheriff. It alleged both political and religious objections to the jurors, and that the panel was taken, contrary to the usual practice, from the list of special jurors.

There has been of late a great deal of gaiety at Dublin Castle—balls, dinner parties, and receptions. With the exception of Lord Normanby, not to say since the time of the Marquis Wellesley has been so hospitable as the present Lord-Lieutenant

"THE GODLESS COLLEGES."—Dr. M'Hale and the Bishops of his province in synod assembled have pronounced against the Government College scheme, and in favour of the establishment of a Catholic University.

MODEL LODGING-HOUSES IN PARIS.—A new French journal, La Paye, gives some account of the model lodging-houses, and about to be executed, by M. Chabert, in the interest of the labouring classes, which extends in some useful respects the principle of the English model lodging-house. His project is to erect in each of the arrondissements of Paris what he calls "labourers' cities." Clean and airy lodgings are to be provided for the tenants, at a price below that of their present tainted abodes; consisting of a kitchen, bedchamber, and sitting-room, heated by stoves in winter, which are to be ventilators in summer. A common wash-house will be established for each "city," and bathing-houses, the tickets for which will be so distributed among the tenants as to allow a certain number to bathe gratis each week in each inhabitant Furnished chambers will be provided at 6 or 8 francs a month for workmen who have no means of purchasing furniture; a portion of the weekly sum going as rent, and the remainder to liquidate the furniture by instalments, when the debt makes it the tenant's own. Each "city" is to have a public hall, warmed as a place of shelter for the poor of the arrondissement: and this will be also a rendezvous for the unemployed workmen of the district—one assistant may find all sorts of handicraftsmen on demand The workmen will inscribe their names with the inspector of the city, whose certificate will be a testimonial to employers in search of hands In several of the arrondissements public meetings have already offered their gratuitous services to these intended establishments.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The Consol market as again been the scene of speculation not less active than in 1845. On Monday the opening price was 92¾ 93; when, after several fluctuations, 93⅛ was reached on Wednesday, and the settling day for the February account, Consols opening at 93⅞ to 94⅛. A momentary scarcity of money caused a reaction to 93⅝, followed by a sudden advance of nearly one per cents, the price resting 94⅛ for money, and 94⅜ for account. This advance was not, however, fully maintained until the close of business. Consols on Wednesday, at the opening, quoted 94⅜ to⅝ for money, and speedily advanced to 94⅝; when a temporary reaction took place, in consequence of the foreign intelligence, reduced quotations to 94⅜ A rally afterwards occurred, and the closing quotation was 94⅝ for the account; the highest price was 94⅞. But on Thursday a reaction occured, several large money sales dampging speculation. Prices consequently receded to 94⅜ for account, and 94⅛ for money. Afterwards receding to 93⅞ for money, upon the Directors of the Bank of England separating without reducing the rate of interest. These rapid changes have been solely the result of speculation, and the reaction is a healthy one, as the fundamentals have not been disturbed. This fact is confirmed from the abundance of money since, proving the fact already well known, that for some weeks past there have been lenders, relying upon the chance of a rise during the next few months. The Bank of France, the most absurd rumours of the effect of the gold discovered in California have been circulated. By one party it was stated that the Russian Government, fearing the depreciation of the effect of the value of their gold, had decided upon withdrawing the prohibition at present existing upon the export of gold, and shipping extensively at once. It was then asserted that the large gold-mines would all of them be monopolised by the Czar, in order to create a fictitious value. In the first case there is not a particle of truth, and our readers will judge for themselves with regard to the probability of the latter. The Russian mines have, during the last ten years, produced £24,650,000 sterling without any perceptible difference; therefore, if Californian gold does ever affect the standard, it must be at some distant date. In the present use appears to be only to alarm the timid and assist wild speculation. The unfounded debt has suffered some depreciation during the week from the probability of the interest being reduced. Bank Stock is also heavy. At the close of the week prices had a downward tendency, the last quotations being for—Bank Stock, 197½; Reduced, 94½; Consols, 93⅞; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 94½; Long Annuities, to expire January, 1860, 9 3-16; Ditto, 32 years, January 5, 1850, 8⅝; India Bonds, under £1000, 53 pm; Bank Stock for Account, 19½; Consols for Account, 93⅞ Exchequer Bills, £1000, March, 41 pm, £1000, June, 46 pm. £500, March, 43 pm, £500, June, 49 pm; Small, March, 41 pm, Small, June, 47 pm.

Business has been less active in the Foreign House during the last week, having been perceptibly confined to Ecuador bonds and Grand Trunks. The former bonds have been scarcely quoted for years, but a rumour, that the Congress of Ecuador are about to entertain the question of some arrangement, as suddenly called them into activity. When the Congress of Ecuador and those among the several republics, Equador accepted £1,430,000 principal, and £1,125,000 arrears of interes. Spanish has not been so extensively dealt in as during the preceding week, and, therefore, the transactions are not so great as were done in Mexican, and the market generally grew heavy towards closing, as the annexed list will show. Brazilian Bonds, 82; Ditto, New, 1829 and 1839, 80; Cuba Bonds, 6 per Cent., 84¾; Callian Bonds, 3 per Cent., 35½; French Rentes, 5 per Cents., 116; Guatemala Bonds, 24¾; Mexican, 5 per Cent., 1846, 25¾; Ditto, Account, 25⅝; Ditto, Deferred, 5 per Cent., 49; Ditto, Account, 49; Portuguese, 4 per Cent., 25; Ditto, Account, 25½; Russian Bonds, 109; Spanish, Account, 18¾; Ditto, Passive, 4⅜; Ditto, Account, 29⅞; Dutch 2½ per Cent., 12 Ditto, Account, 50¾; Ditto, 4 per Cent. Certificates, 79½; Ditto, Account, 80¼.

There has not been any speculation in the Share Market, prices having been maintained by good dividends declared by the Great Western Railway Company, consequent upon the reduction of the dividend, while North-Western as firm. The South Western Company, after a lengthened meeting on Thursday, adopted the report. At the Great Western meeting the report was also adopted, but the last prices quoted are, for Aberdeen, 18¾ X 1.; Bristol and Exeter, 68½; Caledonian, 24½; Ditto Quarter Shares, 8; Ditto, New £10 Pref., 8½; Chester and Holyhead, 22; East Anglia, 1-16; East Lancashire, D., 6⅛, E. and F., 2⅜; Eastern Counties, 3⅜; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 11½; Ditto New, Guaranteed Six per Cent., 17½; Ditto, Extension, Five per Cent., 4⅞; Ditto, Ditto, No 2, 4⅞; Ditto, Five per Cent., 53½; Eastern Union Scrip (6 per Cent. THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Although the arrivals of English wheat for our markets this week have been on a very limited scale, we have to report a dull inquiry for that article, at a decline in the quotations of from 1s to 2s per quarter. Large quantities of foreign wheat having been pressed for sale, with the prospect of a speedy addition to our stocks on hand, the rates have given way to 1s per quarter, with a very inactive demand. The supply of barley has not been large, yet much difficulty has been experienced in effecting sales at late currencies In malt there is no change doing. The best parcels of oats have nearly sold at full prices, but the value of the middling and inferior kinds has given way 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and Indian corn have commanded very little attention. In the best qualities of flour have ruled tolerably firm Other sorts have sold at a trifle less money

Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 58s to 60s; brown ditto, 52s to 56s; Kingston and Ware, 58s to 62s; Chevalier, 58s to 62s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 19s; potato ditto, 21s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 16s to 17s; ditto, white, 17s to 21s; tick beans, new, 28s to 31s; ditto, old, —s to —s; grey peas, flour, 30s to 44s; Suffolk, 34s to 35s; white, 32s to 34s; pollards, 23s to 24s per quarter. THE ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PROTECTION OF LIFE FROM FIRE.

The lamentable occurrence of several serious Fires in the metropolis, within the last few days, has suggested the present introduction to our readers of the claims of the above Society upon public support and encouragement.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire have just published a short statement of "Cases of life saved" (to be had gratis at 169, Fleet-street), from which it appears that the past year has brought into activity the great usefulness of the Association.

The uniform success of their servants in those parts of the metropolis where they have stations induced the parochial authorities of St. George's, Southwark, in the early part of 1848, to enter into an arrangement with the Society for placing two fire-escapes in that populous district. One was, accordingly, stationed at St. George's Church, in the Borough; the second at the Obelisk in Blackfriars-road (See the Illustration). The latter station, in compliance with a requisition most numerously and respectably signed by the inhabitant subscribers, has been furnished with a new and improved Fire-Escape, invented and constructed by Mr. D. Davies, carriage-builder to the Great Western Railway Company.

This Escape (the third invented by Mr. Davies) is shown in the accompanying Engraving: it consists of a main ladder, mounted upon a light and easily-managed travelling carriage. The ladder is trussed in a novel and ingenious manner with wire rope, so as to possess great strength combined with lightness. A capacious balcony slides up and down the main ladder, being raised by a small windlass, the handles of which are placed at the sides of the carriage. The descent of the balcony is also controlled by a lever brake; and it is lowered on to two massive buffers of vulcanised india-rubber, to guard against accident. The main ladder is especially adapted for second-floor windows; but it carries a supplementary ladder for first-floors, or, when fixed to the balcony, for communicating with the third-floor windows or roof of a house.

A folding lever at the lower part of the carriage furnishes a ready and convenient means of propelling and guiding the machine, as it travels in the erect position.

This new machine came into practical use in August last, at a fire which broke out in the lower part of the premises of Mr. Clare, in Friar-street, Blackfriars-road, when Conductor Wood happily succeeded in rescuing Mr. Clare, his wife, and child, just as they were about to precipitate themselves from the window, to avoid impending suffocation.

The following is a summary of fires attended, and human lives saved by means of the Society's fire-escapes and conductors, since its re-establishment in 1843:—

Year.	Number of Stations.	Fires attended.	Lives saved.
1844 .. 9	(increased during year)	11 .. 68	9
1845 .. 11	" "	15 .. 82	8
1846 .. 15	" "	21 .. 150	13
1847 .. 21	" "	24 .. 196	12
1848 .. 24	" "	26 .. 253	27

This statement furnishes the most gratifying and convincing evidence of the importance and utility of the services rendered by the Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire; and, when we consider the frequency of fires in this metropolis, and the appalling calamities by which many of them were attended previous to the establishment of this valuable institution, it is matter of surprise and regret that more adequate support is not afforded by the public, so as to extend still more widely the field of its useful labours.

DAVIES'S FIRE-ESCAPE OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PROTECTION OF LIFE FROM FIRE, AT THE OBELISK, BLACKFRIARS-ROAD.

The Society is entirely dependent upon the voluntary contributions of the humane, and is under the patronage of her most Gracious Majesty.

The present number of the Society's fire-escape stations is twenty-six, each of which entails an expense of about eighty pounds annually. The affairs of the Association are managed, and the accounts audited by the subscribers; it has no expensive "staff," but the whole of its funds are devoted to its legitimate objects, viz.—the maintaining, at distances of half-a-mile from each other, "fire-escape stations" throughout London, each attended by a well-disciplined conductor; and rewarding all persons saving life from fire.

At each station there is a fire-escape, attended throughout the night by a conductor well instructed in its use, and provided with all necessary implements; and it is his duty to attend any fire in his neighbourhood, upon the first alarm being communicated to him.

THE NIAGARA FALLS SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

Preparatory to the construction of this extraordinary work across the Niagara river, at a point about one mile and three-quarters below the Falls, and directly over the frightful rapids which commence here—was contrived a Basket Ferry, secured to temporary towers upon each bank, in the manner shewn in the Illustration. This Ferry was first used March 13, 1848: the span is 800 feet, and the height of the rope 230 feet; height of each temporary tower, 50 feet. The passengers were conveyed in the manner shewn in the Illustration across the river, 250 feet deep.

Upon this spot has since been completed the permanent bridge; and "its thousands of tons weight of the strongest iron cord that the ingenuity of the iron-master can devise find a support in iron-wrought anchors, built in the solid rock 100 feet below the surface."

Upon the very edge of the awful precipice which bounds each shore of the river are raised the stone towers, about 80 feet in height; and at a point about 100 feet in the rear of these huge towers are fastened the immense strands or ropes of wire which sustain the bridge in mid-air. These strands pass from their fastenings immediately over the top of the tower upon either cliff, they pass thence across the chasm, and the over the top of the tower upon the opposite shore, in the rear of which the ends are fastened into the rocks, as above described. The bridge is entirely supported by these strong strands of wire; the platform is about 10 feet in width, and is composed of light planks, resting upon thin scantling, to which the wires are fastened. Mr. Eller, the builder, laid the last plank on July 29, and the same morning drove over the bridge and back in a buggy.

Public Life in Missouri.—Public life in Missouri is attended with inconveniences not uncommon to elevated stations. Governor Edwards, in his farewell address, says, almost every Governor has fallen before envy, malice, and hatred. The brief history he gives of his predecessors is quite interesting. He says:—"One—a good man and a patriot—resigned and left his post before his time expired; the next left before his term was out, and not in good odour; the next committed suicide a year in advance of the close of his four years; and the next has moved at all times prepared to meet the assassin during at least three years and a half out of the four of his administration." Governor Edwards may congratulate himself on going out of his office without having to be carried.—American Paper.

Restoration of Thornbury Church.—The work of restoring the fine old parish church of Thornbury, in Gloucestershire, is rapidly progressing under the able superintendence of F. Niblett, Esq., architect of Gloucester city. The east window, a five-light decorated one, is to be filled with stained glass, the execution of which is entrusted to Mr. George Rogers, of Worcester.

THE BRITISH COLONIES AND THE COLONIAL OFFICE.

IT is only within the last three or four years that the attention of the public has been strongly attracted to the vast importance of our Colonial Empire. The idea implied in the word Colonisation, though old as the earliest periods of recorded history, has been an idea without effect upon the mind of modern nations. It appears to be true that "the art of Colonisation has been lost." Even as regards Emigration, the only creatures that can be said to emigrate upon anything like a system in our day are the inhabitants of the apiary. Emigration, however, has been a matter more within the comprehension of the great human hives of Europe than Colonisation. But even Emigration has been uniformly neglected and impeded by all the States and Governments of our time. Great Britain has the largest Colonial Empire in the world; but the Government of Great Britain, whatever party may have been in power, has invariably shown a cruel indifference or a still more culpable hostility to the enterprising multitudes who have carried the language and civilisation of England to the remotest corners of the earth.

The fairest collection of prosperous states that the world ever saw, and the great destiny of which already shines in dazzling brillancy upon the far horizon of the future, owes its existence to the energy of Englishmen compelled by persecution or by necessity to seek their fortune beyond the narrow boundary of their native land. The United States of America are the creatures of Emigration, not of Colonisation. Australia, which, in the fulness of time, will, we cannot doubt, grow into an empire as magnificent as the United States, is equally the creature of Emigration, and has already risen to comparative importance and prosperity, in spite of the neglect or mis-government by the corporate power of the mother country. The great work has gone on almost imperceptibly. The people, and not their Governments, have performed it. The spur of necessity acting upon individuals has forced some of the best blood of the old country into new regions. The work has proceeded from day to day and from year to year, although the subject of Emigration has been unfashionable to speak or to write about; and although our statesmen and our journalists have misunderstood it from little knowledge, or neglected it from total ignorance. As for Colonisation, the very idea has been scouted. Lately, however, there has been a change in the public sentiment. The kindred subjects of Emigration and Colonisation have become fashionable. The keen competition and vast pressure for existence in this densely peopled country, which has not an inch of ground unowned or unoccupied, and the danger which menaces society from the increasing swarms of hungry men who are willing to work, but are unable to find employment, have opened the eyes of the earnest thinkers of our time to the immense resources which our Colonies afford to the enterprising and the industrious, and to the present relief, as well as future enrichment of this country, which may be expected, if they be duly turned to account.

A few years ago, a threatened debate upon the grievances of a colony, or upon the necessity of emigration, was quite sufficient to produce a "count out." At the present time, no subject is more certain to procure a large attendance of members, and a more earnest attention upon the part of that public for whom the members speak and legislate. There is a general and a too correct impression among well-informed men, that, however much may have been done, a great deal which ought to have been done has been left undone; and that a large amount of the "thews and sinews" of this nation has drafted itself away to the United States of America, to aid in forming a rival and, possibly, hostile power; when, by a little more wisdom at the Colonial Office, it might have been directed to our own Colonies and dependencies. There is also an impression, equally strong and well-founded, that such Colonies as we possess have been oppressed or mis-managed. The Colonial Office has long been denounced by the colonists themselves, and by the few people in England who understand the subject, as the great incubus that lies upon the bosom of our Colonies, impeding their respiration, stunting their growth, cramping their limbs, and endangering their very existence. These denunciations have grown louder and more intense from year to year; and at the present day it is scarcely an exaggeration to assert that the Colonial Office is in the unfortunate position of the man, in the popular saying, who has no friends, and who may be hit hard accordingly. As far as we are aware, there is not a single public writer who has a good word to say in favour of the ostensible or the real chiefs of the Colonial Office; or a single public man, unconnected with the Office, who has defended, or is ready to defend, the principles upon which the government of our magnificent Colonies has been conducted by it ever since Great Britain possessed a dependency. The "Statesman," whose enquiries to Mr. Gibbon Wakefield have led to the publication of the most valuable work on the "Art of Colonization" which has ever appeared, expresses to that gentleman the general impression of the public upon the subject of Colonial mismanagement. "Everybody who reads the newspapers sees," says he, "that our Colonies cost us much money, much trouble, and not a little shame, without rendering any important service to us in return. All of them, at one time or another, seem to get into a state of disorder or disaffection. Just now, the number of our disturbed Colonies is more than usually large, and there is not one of the whole forty of which an Englishman can feel proud. All of them together provide for fewer emigrants than the United States. Canada, which receives the greatest number of emigrants we are, by all accounts, only peopling and enriching for the Americans to possess ere long; and of the only other part of the world to which British emigrants proceed, the population, after seventy years of what is termed Colonization, amounts to no more than 300,000, or about that of the city of Glasgow. The West Indian Colonies are in a truly lamentable state, both economically and politically. So is South Africa, politically, at least, with its Colonial relations and Kaffir wars. So is Ceylon, with its uproarious Governor and native insurrection. So is our youngest Colony, New Zealand, as the seat of a deadly feud between colonist and native; of a costly military occupation, in order to maintain British authority at all; and of the wildest experiments in Colonial government. So is, on one account or another, every one of the Colonies, more or less."

When such is the general feeling, it is not surprising that the motion of Mr. Baillie, which stood on the Commons' paper for Tuesday night, and which involved not alone the misgovernment of a Colony by an individual Governor, but the whole system of the Colonial Office, should have attracted unusual attention. The words of Mr. Baillie's motion bore especial reference to the colonies of Ceylon and British Guiana alone: but, strictly speaking, the first of these is not a colony of Great Britain; it is a dependency which we have conquered, and which we hold in defiance of the natives. Guiana may more properly be considered a colony. The grievances of Ceylon are of old date, and are almost inseparable in kind from those of a conquered province. Those of Guiana are no older than 1846, and, according to Mr. Labouchere, the whole foundation of the dispute between that colony and the Colonial Office is upon the question of Free Trade, Guiana alleging that in consequence of the act of 1846 she can no longer pay taxes or support her establishments. This fact led to an impression on the part of some zealous free-traders that the object of Mr. Baillie in bringing forward a motion for a Committee of Inquiry into the affairs of these colonies was to damage the cause of Free Trade rather than to attack the Colonial Office. The result was some confusion in a debate that would otherwise have been very clear and simple. We have not space to enter into the detail of the facts adduced by Mr. Baillie with reference to the conduct of Lord Torrington, the Governor of Ceylon, either in the suppression of the recent rebellion, or in his general management of the affairs of that island; neither can we follow Mr. Baillie in his remarks upon the various obstructions opposed to good colonial Government by the existence of our Colonial Office in its present state, as exemplified by the circumstances of the two colonies which he selected as the objects of his motion. The feeling of Parliament took a much wider range than Mr. Baillie's motion; and we are much mistaken if the revision of the whole system of our Colonial Government be not the result. The motion may or it may not have been intended to produce such an effect, but the tendency of opinion was too clear to be misunderstood, either in the House or out of it.

The words of the motion were for the appointment of a "Select Committee to enquire into the grievances complained of in the Crown Colonies of Ceylon and British Guiana, and to report to the House whether any measures can be adopted for the better administration and government of those dependencies." Mr. Hume—who does not generally support the party of which Mr. Baillie is a member—seconded the motion, wishing the House to understand that it was the system under which our Colonies were placed which had produced the disastrous results described by Mr. Baillie. He dilated upon the harsh treatment which Ceylon had experienced, upon the insult which Demerara had received at the hands of the Colonial Secretary in the matter of the Civil List, and claimed for the Colonies that self-government which was denied only on account of the patronage it would wrest from the Colonial Office. Mr. Hume somewhat confused the matter by introducing the grievances of the Cingalese into a sentence in which he urged self-government as a cure for Colonial dissatisfaction; but, though a staunch Free-Trader, he saw no protectionist trap in the motion, but simply a Colonial question of the gravest importance. Mr. Ricardo, a Free-Trader, not a whit more zealous than Mr. Hume, seems to have been of a different opinion, and still more greatly confused the subject and the debate by proposing an addition to the motion, affirming in effect though not in terms, that no inquiry would be made into the grievances of either with a view to interference with the Free Trade tariff of 1846. The debate, consequently, took a turn that was probably anticipated by the friends of the Colonial Minister and by Mr. Ricardo, but which was not ultimately successful in distracting the attention of the House from the real point at issue—the ignorant, the protracted, the systematic, the obstinate, and mischievous mismanagement of all our Colonies under the rule of the Downing-street officials. The House felt, as the country feels, that a system which is complained of by persons in such different circumstances as the emigrants of Australia, New Zealand, Canada, the Cape, and the West Indies, must be a bad one. It felt that when, in consequence of this system, insurrection occurs among the French Canadians at one period, among the Kaffirs at a second, and among the Cingalese at a third, and when the people we conquer, and the emigrants who leave our shores, are alike indignant and oppressed, it is high time that a change should take place. Sir Robert Peel cleared away the smoke and dust of the discussion raised by Mr. Ricardo. He gave the complainants of Guiana to understand that he was decidedly opposed to any re-consideration, to suit their purposes, of the Free-Trade measures of 1846. At the same time, as the House seemed to be agreed on the main point, he wished a resolution to be brought forward, for an inquiry to ascertain, without especial reference to the Minister at present at the head of that department, whether some change might not be effected in our colonial system, which would give general satisfaction both to the Colonies and to the public at home. Mr. Baillie afterwards amended his motion. Mr. Hume added a few words, which rendered all misconception impossible upon the part of the few Free-Traders who supported Mr. Ricardo; and in this form the resolution was carried without a division. This result is in reality a defeat of the Ministers. It is to be hoped, for the interest of the Colonies, that it will lead to the general revision of our colonial system, which Sir Robert Peel seems not unwilling to sanction, and which Parliament seems by no means disinclined to undertake.

The system pursued in Downing-street cannot be overhauled without benefit both to the Colonies and to the multitudes of industrious and enterprising Englishmen who would emigrate to the British Colonies rather than to the United States of America, if they could be assured, before their departure, that they should enjoy in their new homes the advantages enjoyed in England, and so dearly prized—those of local self-government. That is the great desideratum. There now seems a fairer prospect than there was before this discussion, that sooner or later it will be obtained. The question of Ceylon is a very different one; and though it bears reference to the Colonial Office, bears none whatever to the great want of our colonists. Such discussions as these, however, [illegible] by a debate of [illegible]; and in showing the [illegible] between Colonies and dependencies, they will lead hereafter to the simplification of a subject that at present is somewhat complicated. The Colonial Office has had many warnings: this last is a significant one.

The Number of "Smiths" in London.—The curious in names would not easily forgive us for trusting over so lightly of the statistics of the London Directory, without satisfying their respecting that large branch of the community whose happiness it is to bear the surname of "Smith." This name occurs 1409 times—107 times in the trade, and 902 in the court department of the Directory—rendering double entries.—Daily News.

Writ of Error.—State Trials.—The Clerk of the Crown returned the writ of error in the case of W. Smith O'Brien

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, the provisions of which he explained. The bill was, he said, similar to that introduced last year. As the law stood, it was not sufficient to put a stop to the corruption and bribery practised at general elections, and this bill was framed with the intent of providing means of inquiry, and of punishing such practices.

Lord Denman considered the bill objectionable in all its provisions. He recommended its reference to a select committee.

Lord Redesdale thought every measure should be tried which had a chance of putting an end to the gross corruption and bribery that prevailed.

Lord Stanley said that, although the bill was introduced as the same as that of last year, it was, in fact, wholly different, for whereas the bill of last year was directed against certain ascertained and past corrupt practices, this bill was directed against prospective and imaginative abuses. It carried the principle of investigation to an extent that would lead to the grossest wrong. There was to be an interminable number of commissioners to go down to suspected places to inquire into the manner of elections, if there had been corrupt practices at the last or preceding elections, and with extraordinary powers of obtaining evidence. The noble Lord pointed out the several anomalies in the details of the bill. He felt an objection to oppose the second reading; but, should he assent to it, he should be glad to be able to go before a select committee, to have its provisions amended.

The Lord Chancellor defended the bill, which was read a second time.

SCOTCH MARRIAGES.

Lord Campbell moved the second reading of the Marriage (Scotland) Bill, and of the Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland) Bill. The noble and learned Lord having briefly alluded to the inconveniences arising from the marriage laws of Scotland, said the first named bill was intended to put with that marriage in that country should in future be solemnised, either by a religious ceremony, or by a contract signed before a public functionary. The bill provided also for registration. To the second bill he did not apprehend there would be any opposition.

The Earl of Aberdeen objected to the measure, as one uncalled for, most impolitic, and likely to prove injurious to the morality and happiness of Scotland. The bill imposed additional restraints on marriage, whereas it was for the advantage of the people of that country that marriage should be as easily contracted as possible. He was ready to agree to any measure that would prevent persons unduly domiciled in Scotland from evading the observance of the law of marriage existing in that country, but he would not assent to the proposal to alter the Scotch law of marriage itself. He would not object to any measure of registration.

Lord Brougham said that every lawyer complained of the Scotch marriage law, as leading to innumerable legal difficulties.

The Duke of Argyll supported the bill, which, after a few words in explanation from Lord Campbell, was read a second time, as was also the Registration Bill.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. Milnes gave notice that, on the 1st of March, he would move for leave to bring in a bill to enable persons holding diplomatic pensions to hold seats in that House.

Mr. Hume gave notice, for Monday next, of his intention to submit a resolution on the subject of explosions in coal-mines.

Mr. J. O'Connell gave notice that, on going into committee of supply, he would move a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the state of Ireland, with the view of appropriating the revenues of the Irish Church to the support of the poor, of taxing to the extent of thirty-three per cent. persons deriving property from Ireland to the amount above £200 a year, who shall not reside at least six months in the year in that country, and of establishing tenant right.

Mr. Labouchere gave notice that, when the Regium Donum grant should be proposed, he would move that it be disallowed.

EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.

In reply to Mr Scott,

Mr. Hawes stated that there was no intention on the part of the emigration committee to give a preference to the two counties named by the hon. gentleman—viz Dorset and Wilts. The fact was, that there had been two ships appointed to sail from Plymouth, but the number of emigrants offering themselves as ready to embark not having been sufficient to fill the berths, the deficiency had been made up from the neighbouring counties. The expense would be about £14 a head; and of course, if the emigrants had been "assisted," a greater number might have gone. The fund at the disposal of the Government was now reduced to about £50,000.

Mr. Scott entered into a long statement of what he conceived to be the hardship of the case, and concluded by moving that there had been an undue preference shown to those two counties; and wished to know if any correspondence which had taken place on the subject would be laid on the table, which he thought desirable, as it might prevent any suspicion that the arrangements of the Government were made with a view to clear the estates of certain gentlemen at the expense of the rest of England.

Mr Hawes said he was not aware of the existence of any such correspondence.

Lord J. Russell, in reply to Mr. Hume, stated that a gentleman had been sent to Edinburgh to make inquiries as to the Annuity Act, and his report when received, would be laid on the table.

Mr. Labouchere, in answer to the same hon. member, said Mr. John Lefevre's report on the Scotch Poor-law would be laid on the table. Government were prepared to act upon it by diminishing the expenses, but certainly not to abolish the board.

HABEAS CORPUS ACT SUSPENSION.

Sir G. Grey moved the third reading of the Habeas Corpus Act Suspension (Ireland) Bill.

Mr. J. O'Connell intimated, that, as Lord Nugent had an amendment to propose, to limit the bill to the 1st of June, it was not his intention to raise a discussion on the third reading, but to content himself with a division, and with supporting the noble Lord's amendment.

Mr. F. O'Connor would not follow the course adopted by Mr. J. O'Connell, but would oppose the third reading. The hon. member at great length spoke against the bill

Sir G. Grey reminded the honourable member that he had violated his own principle of limiting speeches to an hour, because he had just consumed an hour and a half with his remarks. The right honourable Baronet declined to follow the honourable member through all the extraneous topics which he had introduced into his speech.

Mr. E. B. Roche opposed the bill, and recommended the passing of measures of reform in the tenure of land, and in the Irish Church Establishment; also, the abolition of the Viceregal Court, and various other reforms, as the true modes of removing Irish dissaffection

Mr. J. A. Hamilton regretted that the Government had not proposed the bill for twelve months instead of six months.

Mr. Hume supported the bill as one necessary to preserve peace and tranquillity in Ireland. The hon. member inveighed against the Irish Establishment Church, and denounced British government in Ireland as one long system of misrule.

Mr. J. O'Connell repeated his opposition to the bill

Mr. S. Crawford said Repeal agitation, and moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a third time that day six months.

The House divided—

For the third reading	.. ..	117
Against it	.. ..	23
Majority	.. ..	—94

The bill was read a third time.

Lord Nugent then moved, in the first clause of the bill, the substitution of the words "1st day of June" for the words "1st day of September." The noble Lord was willing, however reluctantly, to continue the suspension of the constitution in Ireland for a time sufficient to enable the Government to prepare those remedial measures necessary for the permanent pacification and satisfaction of Ireland; but he would not consent to suspend the constitution one day longer than was imperatively demanded by the necessity of the case.

Colonel P. Thompson seconded the amendment.

Sir George Grey said the Government had followed the shortest precedent on record. It would involve the House in interminable discussions, and prevent the progress of those remedial measures so desired, were the bill to be limited to three months.

Mr. Reynolds would not vote for the amendment, or advise his friends to do so. He recommended the noble Lord to withdraw it.

After a few words from Mr. J. O'Connell, the House divided—

For the original words	.. ..	166
Against them	.. ..	11
Majority for the Government	.. ..	—155

The bill then passed.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS.—JEWISH DISABILITIES.

Lord J. Russell moved a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the oaths taken by members of the two Houses of Parliament. The noble Lord having brought in the Jewish Disabilities Bill, which he brought in last year, and which was rejected by the House of Peers, said that he [illegible] but he would not propose to interfere [illegible] he could prove to the House that the oaths taken by members [illegible] Catholics had not answered the purpose, he hoped that just and liberal men [illegible] after those oaths. The oaths at present taken were unnecessary, ambiguous, and interposed an undue restriction on a portion of her Majesty's subjects which was quite unjustifiable. The first oath taken was that of allegiance, to which he had nothing to object. The oath of supremacy came next, the words of which had arisen from some doubt in the oath of allegiance; and this oath of supremacy prevented some Peers, one of whom was Lord Clanmorry, from taking their seats in Parliament. The Roman Catholic was only required to declare that neither the Pope nor other foreign potentate or prelate had civil or temporal jurisdiction within this realm, while the Protestant was required to declare that he had no spiritual or temporal. He thought it would be sufficient for the Protestant to declare that the Pope, &c., had no civil or temporal jurisdiction or authority in the realm. If the oath of supremacy prevented even one member from taking his seat, it should, if possible, be amended. The third oath was that of abjuration, which since 1697 was a sort of mockery, for there was since that period no descendant of the Pretender. This oath concluded with words declaring that the person taking it took it on the "true faith of a Christian." This excluded her Majesty's Jewish subjects. He maintained that they had no right to exclude any person, unless his doctrines were such as to render him incompetent to discharge the duties of a member of Parliament. To exclude him would be a pure, unmitigated persecution, the same in principle as that which led to the faggot and the axe. The proposal he had to make was to retain the oath taken by the Roman Catholics; also to alter the oath taken by other members in the following form—

"I, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, and that I will maintain the succession of the Crown as established by an act, intituled 'An act for the further limitation of the Crown and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject;' and that I do not believe that the Pope of Rome or any other foreign prince, prelate, person, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any temporal or civil jurisdiction, authority, power or pre-eminence within this realm, and that I will defend to the utmost of my power within this realm, and that I will maintain, as established by the laws. And I do make this recognition, declaration, and promise, heartily, willingly, and truly, on the true faith of a Christian, so help me God."

And, finally, he proposed that when this oath was administered to a person of the Jewish persuasion, the words "on the true faith of a Christian" should be omitted. It was a question with him whether the words should be retained in the oath at all.

Mr. Goulburn said [illegible] to the first stage of the proposal, and will [illegible] House [illegible] be put in possession of [illegible] But he protested against the principles laid down by the noble Lord, and thought he should have to oppose the measure.

Mr. Plumptre would take his stand at once, and divide the House on the very first proposition.

Mr. Law had not intended to oppose the motion to go into committee to consider the proposal, but he should oppose it on all occasions. He did not believe that the measure [illegible] Jewish [illegible] and he believed, on the contrary, that the bad feeling that existed against the Jews would [illegible] The Lord Advocate and learned member appealed to the noble Lord not to ask the House to go into committee without time for considering his proposition.

Mr. O'Connell regretted that the Prime Minister had not thought fit to propose the establishment of one uniform oath for all members alike.

Mr. Bankes regretted the absence of Sir R. Inglis from the House in consequence of indisposition. The hon. member also urged the Prime Minister to postpone the consideration of the question. He declared his resolution to divide with Mr. Plumptre against the motion to go into committee to entertain the proposition. He (Mr. Bankes) had been on previous occasions to come to a division last night, but the House had been taken by surprise by the Government, and though the numbers would be small, it was necessary on principle to protest against the proposal just made.

Mr. Gladstone was still of opinion that Jews had a full right to civil and political privileges. He was also of opinion that the question of the general oath proposed by the Minister would be an amendment, for the fewer words used in so solemn a declaration the better. He thought the noble Lord acted wisely in retaining the words "on the true faith of a Christian" in the oath to be taken by Christians; but he was of opinion that he would have still further improved his proposal had he rejected the words declaring "that the Pope had no temporal power or pre-eminence within the realm." Except to Roman Catholics these words had no application, and other members should not be required to make such a declaration.

Mr. Newdegate asked the Prime Minister to consent to an adjournment. He was resolved to defend the Christian character of the Parliament of this Christian country. The hon. member moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. Drummond thought that, whatever pleasure was put to the proposition, it was only a rehearsal of the Jew bill of last year.

Mr. Walpole suggested that the Ministers should be satisfied with going into committee pro forma, in order to lay a substantial proposition for consideration.

Lord J. Russell said that all he asked the House to do was to assent to a resolution that it was expedient to alter the oaths taken by members, and to make provision for altering them."

Mr. Walpole maintained that Christianity was a necessary principle in the legislature of this country. He condemned the Government for re-opening this question after so recent a decision on it, for proposing what might lead to a disagreement between the two Houses of Parliament, and for doing a violence to the feelings of a great mass of the people.

Lord J. Russell agreed, should the House assent to go into committee, to be satisfied with laying his resolution before it, and going no further then, in case a discussion should be raised upon it.

Mr. Newdegate withdrew his motion for the adjournment of the House.

A division then took place on the question to go into committee.

For going into committee	.. ..	214
Against it	.. ..	111
Majority for the Government	.. ..	103

The House went into committee pro formâ, and the resolution was proposed for consideration. Progress was then reported, and the chairman obtained leave to sit again.

Sir Robert Inglis on Irish fisheries was nominated.

Sir W. Somerville obtained leave to bring in a bill to continue in office, for a limited time, the existing commissioners of inquiry into Poor-law unions in Ireland. Adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

The Habeas Corpus Act Suspension (Ireland) Bill was brought up from the House of Commons, and read a first time; the second reading was fixed for Friday next.

After the presentation of petitions, and some other unimportant business, their Lordships adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. Stanley gave notice, for the 6th of March, of a motion for the appointment of an unpaid commission to devise measures, other than political, for the benefit of the poor.

Mr. Bankes gave notice of his intention to propose an addition to the oath proposed by Lord J. Russel to be taken by members of Parliament not being Roman Catholics, declaring that the person taking it would not endeavour to subvert the Protestant Church or disturb the Protestant religion or Government established in the United Kingdom.

To a question from Mr. Wyld, the Attorney-General replied that it was his intention to introduce a measure to abolish the Palace Court

CEYLON AND BRITISH GUIANA COLONIAL MISRULE.

Mr. H. Baillie moved for a select committee to inquire into the grievances complained of in the Crown colonies of Ceylon and British Guiana, and to report to the House whether any measures can be adopted for the better administration and government of these dependencies. The hon. member said he was prepared to prove a general charge of misgovernment against the Colonial Office. It was no matter how active, energetic, or well-disposed the man who administered the affairs of the colonies might be, he was overcrowded by the Colonial Office. The colonists were led to expect something from a noble Lord who, when in opposition, gave expression to most liberal sentiments, but their expectations were turned into bitter disappointment when that noble Lord was placed at the head of colonial affairs. But it was not a charge of inefficiency alone that he was prepared to make against the Colonial Office: he indicted it of tyranny and oppression. The hon. member proceeded to animadvert at the occasion of wasteful, extravagant expenditure, and of general misgovernment. Should he be able to make good these charges, he thought he should have made out a case for a Parliamentary inquiry. The hon. member proceeded to describe the condition of Ceylon and Demerara, which he adduced as examples of the way in which our colonies are mismanaged and oppressed. In Ceylon there was not the pretension of a constitutional government—it was a despotism. Here discontent had broken out into rebellion, and the most revolting cruelties had been perpetrated after the rebellion had been suppressed, under the authority of Lord Torrington, the present Governor—cruelties so atrocious, that he could look for a parallel to them only in Spain. Eighteen men had been executed under martial law, and these executions had been carried into effect under circumstances of perfect brutality. A native priest had been executed on the scaffold of a semi-civil tribunal, and a native king had been subjected to corporal punishment. When the Chief Justice wrote to Lord Torrington, recommending that the sentence of death should be carried into effect only by the casting vote of Lord Torrington! Such was the case of Ceylon, which certainly demanded a parliamentary inquiry. With respect to British Guiana, it was a colony that was regarded as one of the most wealthy, and to withstand the attacks of the mother country, but it could not resist the withering influences of the Colonial Office, which had fulfilled its accustomed work in reducing the complete ruin of the plantations. Extravagant expenditure and wasteful extravagance characterised the government of Sir Gish Guiana, the people of which colony were taxed to the amount of £2 6s per head. With respect to the Mauritius, it was prepared to establish like charges against the Colonial Office, and he had intended to include Mauritius and Lord Grey, the hon. member asked for inquiry in the name of justice and of the outraged constitution.

Mr. Hume seconded the motion, and [illegible] he was able [illegible] could with equal propriety be extended to the Cape of Good Hope, to the Mauritius, and, in short, to all our other Crown colonies. Unless the House should determine to give the colonies the absolute control over their own expenditure and affairs, there was no ground for hoping for colonial content or prosperity

Mr. Ricardo moved, as an amendment, to be added to the motion after the word "dependencies"—"Whereby they may be rendered more capable of meeting the difficulties of the transition from a system of protection to that competition in the British market with the produce of foreign states to which Parliament has determined that they should be exposed, in accordance with the general commercial policy which it has deliberately adopted." The hon. member considered that Mr Baillie's motion was made with the object of embarrassing the Government, in the vain hope of obtaining the restitution of that protection which Parliament had resolved to abolish

Mr. HAWES was ready to meet the proposed inquiry; he courted inquiry, and he was determined to have inquiry, not only into the affairs of Ceylon and British Guiana, but of Mauritius also. The charges had been made by the hon. member in a most unfair and disingenuous manner; he had suppressed every act that told in favour of Lord Torrington, and had placed everything that could tell against him in the most odious light. It was not the tax ordinances of Lord Torrington that excited rebellion, although they were made the pretence of it; and the Governor could not be had responsible for the executions that took place when the colony was placed under martial law, and when the regular government was suspended. With respect to British Guiana, it was not the fact that Lord Grey had set himself against a fair consideration of the civil list; he had only refused to be diverted from his principles by a combination of persons acting on pretences that had no foundation in truth. The revenues and the produce of British Guiana had increased during the last year; the civil list was not so onerous as had been represented; and therefore the allegation of the impoverishment of British Guiana, which was made the excuse for not granting the supplies, was untrue. Lord Grey, on his accession to office, having rehearsed the liberal acts of Lord Grey, and announced the intention to introduce a bill during this session to confer a representative government on Australia, insisted that the colonial admiration of Lord Grey was wise, honest, and sagacious. The committee of inquiry would be agreed to by the Government, provided the addition moved by Mr Ricardo were made to it.

Sir W. MOLESWORTH, at great length, condemned the extravagant expenditure of Ceylon, and suggested the propriety of transferring that colony to the East India Company

After a few words from Mr. ADDERLEY and Mr. F SCOTT, who condemned the colonial system as a bold, bad despotism.

Sir R. PEEL wished that the terms of the inquiry could be so modified as that no divi ion should take place upon the appointment of a committee. Without reference to any personal consideration, seeing the dissatisfied condition of the colonies, he thought that some advantage might be derived from inquiry. He could not conceal the fact that a perusal of the documents on the table had left an unfavourable impression on his mind; and he regretted the tone and temper of some of the despatches. He found, that the ministers of the Government themselves, that the religion and the customs of Ceylon had been most unwisely disregarded—that a priest had been shot in his robes, and a native prince had been subjected to corporal punishment, and the feelings of a whole people had been alienated from this country. He thought the wording of the motion and of the amendment might be improved

Lord J. RUSSELL charged the hon. mover of the committee with having suppressed and concealed all that Lord Torrington had done in favour of the planters of Ceylon, whilst he dressed up all that bore against the noble Lord in the most virulent spirit. The Minister proceeded and defended the conduct of Lord Torrington, to whom, he said, we were much indebted for his energy in putting down the insurrection at its commencement. In respect to the facts of the execution of the priest in his sacerdotal robes, and of the corporal punishment of the Prince, he declined to give any opinion. A governor had a difficult task to fulfil in such cases, for on the one hand he was liable to be charged with favouring superstitious rites, and on the other with want of respect for the customs and religious feelings of the people to be governed. Lord Grey's patronage had been disposed in a manner most advantageous for the colonies, and the governors selected by him had been selected with great care and judgment. Notwithstanding the bitter personal attacks made on Lord Torrington and Lord Grey, he would assent to the committee in the terms proposed, though with the addition proposed by Mr. Ricardo. If the committee were appointed in the original words alone, it might give rise to an opinion that the system of commercial policy now adopted might be shaken by adverse evidence; therefore he objected to the original motion alone

Mr. DISRAELI said that nothing was farther from the intention of Mr. Baillie than to raise a discussion or inquiry on the "new commercial system." His ample desire was to confine inquiry to the substantial question of the administration of government of Ceylon and British Guiana. The amendment moved by Mr. Ricardo alone raised the question of the new commercial system, and embarrassed the subject. It was useless for the Government to propose to accept the motion, provided the amendment was backed to it. Such a proposal could not be acceded to. Simple inquiry into alleged colonial abuses was what was desired, and he would not advise Mr. Baillie to alter one word of his motion, or to allow it to be defeated by a manœuvre which had not even the merit of dexterity.

Mr. LABOUCHERE would reject any division on the question. He thought that exception might be taken both to the original motion and to the amendment, and he hoped that some terms might be devised that would satisfy all parties He therefore suggested to leave the words "into the grievances complained of" out of the motion, whereupon it would stand "That a committee be appointed to inquire and report to the House whether any measure can be adopted for the better administration and government of the Crown colonies of Ceylon and British Guiana."

Mr. B. OSBORNE protested against the introduction of the bugbear of Free Trade for the purpose of bewildering the House.

Mr. BAILLIE desired to know if the amendment was to be withdrawn?

Mr. RICARDO did not think there was much difference between gentlemen opposite and himself. A declaration was wanted against the new system.

Mr. F. WOOD suggested another version of the motion, with the hope of getting the Government out of the difficulty.

Lord LABOUCHERE could not rely for Mr. Ricardo's amendment; but, should it be withdrawn, he believed Mr. Baillie was ready to modify, not the spirit, but the terms of his motion. The form of motion proposed by Mr. Labouchere was open to some objection.

Mr RICARDO withdrew his amendment, and, after a great many proposals and counter-proposals, the motion was agreed to in the following terms.

"That a committee be appointed to inquire into the grievances complained of in the Crown colonies of Ceylon and British Guiana, in connexion with the administration and government of those dependencies; and to report whether any measure can be adopted for the redress of the grievances of which there might be just cause of complaint."

The select committee on the Slave Trade was nominated.

Mr. BARNES obtained leave to bring in a bill to remove doubts as to the appointment of overseers of the poor in cities and boroughs.

Adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at two o'clock

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS BILL

Sir J. PAKINGTON moved the second reading of the Bribery at Elections Prevention Bill, the object of which was to oblige members to swear, on taking their seats, that they had not, directly or indirectly, expended any money in corruption or bribery, and that they would not pay any sum for such purposes, should it be demanded of them. The bill also provided that candidates on the hustings should, if required, be obliged to take a similar oath. In case any member should, after taking the oath, be found guilty of bribery at the election to which the oath referred, the bill provided that he should be incapacitated for life from sitting in Parliament. The hon. member said he had framed the declaration with great care; but, as the utmost caution was necessary in wording such an oath, he proposed, should the bill obtain a second reading, to refer it to a select committee. The bill did not deal with treating; but he was willing to leave that part of the subject to the committee.

Colonel SIBTHORP would reserve his opinion upon the bill until he should see how it would come down from the select committee. As free trade in everything was the new policy, he could not see why an exception should be made in the case of elections.

Sir J. HANMER, Lord MAHON, and Mr. AGLIONBY gave a qualified support to the bill.

Sir GEORGE GREY said that every clause in the bill was open to grave objection; but, as the principle was good, and the feeling of the House seemed to be favourable to it, he would not refuse his assent to the second reading, provided it would then be referred to a select committee.

Mr. TURNER had insuperable objections to the bill, and could not permit it to be read a second time without a division. The amendment was therefore moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

After a short discussion, in which Mr. Cockburn, Mr. Henley, Mr. Hume, Mr. Headlam, Mr D Crawford, Mr. F. O'Connor, and Mr. Hodgson took part, the House divided—

For the second reading,	..	..	..	..	110
Against it,	..	..	..	..	80
Majority	..	..	..	..	—30

The bill was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a select committee.

The Petty Sessions Bill, and the Distraining for Rates Bill, were severally read second time.

The Commons Inclosure Bill passed through committee.

Adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Lord BROUGHAM, in presenting a petition praying for an extension of the penal code of local courts, took occasion to express a wish that some measure might be adopted to remedy the abuses of the Palace Court.

CEYLON.—Lord BROUGHAM said the only reason why he did not give notice of a motion on the subject of the recent proceedings in Ceylon, was the hope that an inquiry instituted in another place might afford a satisfactory explanation of those proceedings. If such satisfactory explanations were not afforded, it would become their Lordships' duty to take notice of the proceedings which had taken place in that island.

INLAND REVENUE BILL.—Earl GRANVILLE moved the second read ng of this bill.—After a few words from Lord BROUGHAM, the motion was agreed to.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

The Bishop of OXFORD rose to move the appointment of a Select Committee to consider what measures should be adopted for the suppression of the African slave trade. He believed the motion would not be opposed, but he felt bound briefly to state the reasons which had induced him to bring forward this motion. England had, of late years, become aware of the enormity of her guilt towards the African race, and as she had set the example of guilt, so she had determined to set the example of repentance, and to endeavour to induce other powers to join her in putting down the slave trade. But of late there had been an apathy existing on the subject in this country. It was easier to make a great sacrifice than to continue pursuing a course of duty which at first sight might appear to be attended with pecuniary loss. The tone of the press on this subject was an unmistakeable proof of the existence of this apathy, and therefore he moved for this Committee. He desired to see the maintenance of the blockading squadron, for, according to evidence of the witnesses examined in another place, with the exception of witnesses who had been or were engaged in the slave trade, it appeared that in proportion to the efficiency of the squadron was the success of the efforts to suppress the slave trade. That squadron, in 1849 and 1843, had all but succeeded in suppressing the slave-trade; and it was only in consequence of the cessation of these exertions, in consequence of orders from home, mistaken orders as he thought, that the trade had revived. He wished a committee to inquire into these matters, and to devise measures for carrying out the greatest act of justice which a nation had ever undertaken to execute. The apathy of the public at present was owing entirely to a forgetfulness of the details of the horrid traffic; and if such details were again brought prominently forward, the public attention would again be directed to the subject, and the country would be as loud as ever in its protests against the commission of this horrible iniquity. It was one thing to consider the question of the slave trade to the Brazils abstractedly, and another to contemplate the horrors which each vial vidual African suffered during the passage. The right rev. Prelate, after alluding to the horrors of the middle passage, as described in the evidence before the Commons Committee, concluded by reading his motion.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE, on the part of the Government, offered no opposition to the appointment of the committee, and in the course of his observations the noble Lord admitted the necessity of maintaining the squadron on the coast of Africa.

After some further discussion, the motion was agreed to.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

INTERNATIONAL ENGLISH AND FRENCH ASSOCIATION

Mr. B. COCHRANE said, he rose to put the question of which he gave notice yesterday, to the hon. member for Tewkesbury.

The SPEAKER (interrupting the hon. member) intimated that he could not, in accordance with the forms of the House, put that question to the hon. member.

Mr. B. COCHRANE said, then he would ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he was aware that an association called the International English and French Association had been formed, at the head of which were the names of five hon. members of that House, namely, the hon. member for Tewkesbury, the hon. member for the Tower Hamlets, the hon. member for Bodmin, the hon. member for Macclesfield, and a whole host of others; and, in addition, the object of that association being an intellectual treat for Easter week. (Laughter.) With the permission of the House, in order to understand the object of this association, he would read one or two extracts from the programme—"There was something delicate and gentlemanly, and something congenial and manly, in the idea which suggested a military visit of citizenship to the English nation." * * * * * * "The social spirit which takes must give; we dine together—we, England and France (a family scene. (Loud laughter.) You, France, dine with me to-day and I, England, claim your hospitality to-morrow." (Renewed laughter.) The gentleman went on to read similar extracts, which excited the greatest merriment in the House. The question which he wished to put to the Under-Secretary of State was as to whether this association, at the head of which were five members of Parliament, was at all known officially to the Government, or had received any act of registration. (Great laughter.)

Mr. H. BROWN: I am, Sir, one of the members whose names appear at the head of that programme, and I will

The SPEAKER: The hon. member is clearly out of order. I have already said that it was unparliamentary to put a question to a private member, or one in the Ministers, on matters not connected with the business of the House; and the hon. member, therefore, cannot proceed.

Mr. BROWN attempted again to speak, but there were cries of "Chair, chair," on all sides, and ultimately the hon. member desisted.—(Cries for the Under-Secretary of State.)

Mr. LEWIS said that he knew little of the association to which the hon. member had called the attention of the House, except what he had just read, but it seemed very innocent in its objects—(laughter on both sides of the House) and he hoped it would prosper. (Repeated cheers from Mr. Brown and the hon. members around him.)

Mr. B. COCHRANE—he could only put the question to the Under-secretary of State, because there were no other Ministers present

Mr. WYLD rose to move that that question be entered on the journals of the House

Mr. H. BROWN would second that motion.

The SPEAKER said that the hon. member could not proceed to make such a motion. (Cries of "Chair, chair," Mr. Wyld for some time persisting in his motion.) He had repeatedly explained that no member could make a motion which did not relate to the business of the House.

The subject then dropped.

MARRIAGES OF RELATIVES.—Mr. STUART WORTLEY moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the act of 5th and 6th Will. IV., c. 54, so far as relates to marriage within certain degrees of affinity The object of the bill, the hon. gentleman explained, was to permit marriages with a deceased wife's sister, and also with a deceased wife's niece. He did not purpose to propose the permission to marriage with a deceased brother's widow, nor making it compulsory upon any clergyman who might object to solemnize such marriages.—Sir G. GREY, as at present advised, would offer no opposition to the introduction of the bill.—Leave was then given to bring in the bill

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION.

On the motion of Mr. BOUVERIE, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House, and agreed to a resolution relating to the act 1st of Wm. and Mary, c. 18 (commonly called the Toleration Act), with a view to its amendment, by extending its benefit, and giving exemption from all penalties to members of the Church of England declaring themselves to be dissenters therefrom, and a bill was ordered to be brought in founded on that resolution.

Mr TRELAWNY moved for a Select Committee to inquire to what extent the public are entitled to claim an interest, present or prospective, in the management of the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, and what returns are annually presented to the House, and whether there is not reason to hope, that these returns, as well as other circumstances, that an improvement in the management of those estates, in particular by the suppression of sinecures, the extravagant fees of office, and the diminution of the salaries of officials, would greatly increase the joint net income of the two duchies.

Lord J. RUSSELL opposed the motion, which, on a division, was negatived by a majority of 74 to 27

Adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES.—The Committee on Standing Orders has disposed of the following bills:—Irish South-Eastern: standing orders dispensed with, on proof of certain notices being published in the Dublin papers. Eastern Counties and Newmarket Amalgamation: standing orders not dispensed with. Great Northern: standing orders dispensed with, on depositing £5000 in the Bank of England. East Lancashire: standing orders dispensed with, on depositing the sum of £6000 in the Court of Chancery being the difference between a tenth part of the subscription contract and the sum deposited in the Bank of England.

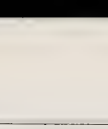
THE OVERLAND ROUTE TO CALIFORNIA.—Lieutenant Morrison, of Colonel Stevenson's New York Regiment of Volunteers, gives the following piece of advice to whom it may concern. We commend it to the particular attention of those who in this, and in some of the other west, are proposing to take the overland route to California:—"Caution to Emigrants. I hope that those who intend to emigrate by land here will be careful that they are not overtaken by storms, or snows, or want of provisions, on their toilsome journey across the Rocky Mountains. I have seen those who started from the borders of Missouri hale and stalwart men, hobble down into the plains of California crippled for life. I have seen brothers who, in the madness of hunger, have fought for the last bit of their father's dead body, having snared the rust at their previous meals!—having been encompassed with snow on the tops of those dreadful mountains. Maidens who left their homes rejoicing in the pride of youth and beauty, in joyous anticipations from this far-off land, by the horrors and sufferings of that fearful journey, despoiled of their loveliness and bloom, withered into premature old age.—New York paper.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR THOMAS BURNETT, BART., OF LEYS, COUNTY ABERDEEN

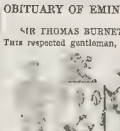
THIS respected gentleman, Lieutenant and Sheriff Principal of the county of Kincardine, died on the 16th inst., at Crathes Castle, aged 60. He was eldest son of the late Sir Robert Burnett, Baronet, by Margaret Dalrymple, his wife, fourth daughter of General Sir Johnstone, and grandson of Sir Thomas Burnett, Bart., by Catherine, his wife, sister of Sir Alexander Ramsay, Bart., of Balmain. He succeeded to the Baronetcy in 1837, which, as he never married, now devolves on his brother, Alexander, who was formerly in the East India Company's service.



The family of Burnett, originally of Norman descent, have flourished for more than five centuries in Scotland; and, according to Sir George Mackenzie, carry the hunting horn on their Shield of Arms, to shew that they are the King's Foresters in the North. Sir Thomas Burnett, the first Baronet of Leys, was, in conjunction with the great Marquess of Montrose, an active Covenanter.

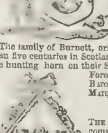
LADY ELIZABETH PALK.

THE death of this venerable lady, who had nearly completed her 85th year, occurred on the 15th inst. She was daughter of Wilmot, first Earl of Lisburne, and widow of Sir Lawrence Palk, Bart., of Haldon House, Devon, by whom she had six sons and two daughters, the younger of the latter being the wife of her cousin, Lord Lisburne, and the elder of the former, the present Sir Lawrence Vaughan Palk, Bart.



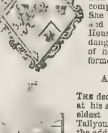
ALEXANDER RENNY TAILYOUR, ESQ., OF BORROWFIELD.

THE decease of this gentleman occurred on the 8th instant, at his seat, Newmanswalls, near Montrose. He was the eldest son of Robert Renny, Esq., by Elizabeth Jean Tallyour, his wife, and assumed, at his mother's decease, the additional surname and arms of Tallyour. He married, 7th of April, 1808, Elizabeth Bannerman, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander Ramsay, Baronet, of Balmain, and has left surviving issue two sons, Thomas, Captain in the Bengal Engineers, and Henry, Captain in the 81st Regiment. The family of Tallyour is one of high respectability in Scotland, and has possessed Borrowfield since 1615



THE HON. GEORGE CAVENDISH.

THE decease of this gentleman is just announced. At one time he held the important office of Secretary to the Lords of the Treasury in Ireland. Mr. George Cavendish was born 26th of August, 1776, the second son of Sir Henry Cavendish, Bart., of Doveridge, by Sarah, Baroness Waterpark, his wife, daughter and heir of Richard Bradshaw, Esq., a collateral descendant of the Lord Chief Justice Bradshaw. He married first, in 1803, Letitia Catherine, daughter of Jennico Caulfield, Esq.; and second, in 1807, Cat rine, daughter of Ralph Smyth, Esq., but has left no issue.



MRS. MARY TERESA ORMSBY.

THE death of this venerable and much lamented lady, which is deeply deplored, occurred on the 13th inst., at No 2, South Hays, Bath, the residence of her son, Captain Howard Ormsby.

THE LATE HON. THOMAS HUGH NUGENT, of whom a memoir appeared in our Journal of the 10th instant, and who is therein stated to have died unmarried, was married, by license, in the church of Attleborough, Norfolk, on 26th of September, 1843, to Mary Anne Busk

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

WESTMINSTER COUNTY COURT

SWEET v. LAWRENCE LEVY. On Wednesday an action brought by the plaintiff, a carver and gilder, to recover £4 18s. from the defendant, a sheriff's officer, being the balance of an account for gilding a drawingroom table, and for the expense of conveying by van certain glasses from the defendant's country house at Rotherville, was decided against the defendant, whereupon he exclaimed, "As I am of the Jewish persuasion, I never expected that you would do otherwise than decide against me." The Judge (Mr. Meylan) instantly ordered him into the custody of the Bailiff, to be destined till the rising of the Court. When the business of the day was concluded, Mr. Levy was introduced, and asked by the Judge whether he had any observation to make, in the way of explanation or apology. "Sir, I have none by pleasure," was the reply. Then (said the Judge), although I can't say it is my pleasure, I feel that it is my duty, to commit you to prison for a fine (and costs) incurred in this Court. You call yourself Mr. Lawrence Levy, an officer of the law. I should have thought it your most especial duty to uphold its administration; on the contrary, you have publicly charged the Court with allowing itself to be warped by religious prejudice against a large and respected class of our fellow-citizens. Your words in addressing me were these: "As I am of the Jewish persuasion, I never expected that you would do otherwise than decide against me." Conveying, very distinctly an imputation that, if not wholly unture, would render me most unfit for the responsible office I hold. I cannot imagine a more serious charge, if well founded, or a grosser insult, if untrue, as I well know it to be. I therefore, feel it to my public duty if I did not, in a marked manner, signify my sense of your misconduct. Even now, after time has been given for reflection, you offer no expression of regret; nor will you do so, I dare say, until you find yourself under the power vested in me by the 113th section of the 9th and 10th Vict., c. 95, I order you to stand committed to the Tothill-fields House of Correction for the term of seven days."—Levy was then removed.

LOSS OF THE WEST INDIA MAIL-PACKET "FORTH."—Accounts have been received during the week, via New York, by the West India Steam-packet Company, of the loss of their steam ship Forth, on the Alkrans, on her passage from Havana to Vera Cruz with the outward mails received from the Lesser. The crew and passengers were saved. The disaster occurred at five o'clock on the morning of the 14th ult. The Forth was a noble ship, and made sixteen successful voyages to the West Indies, Mexico, &c., previous to this disaster. She was built at Leith, in 1841, by Menzies and Co., and was of 1147 tons register, with engines of 450 horse power. Her last Southampton out the 2nd of November, and was due here on the 23rd instant. It is worthy of remark that Mr. J. B. Rowland, her surgeon, was wrecked on the same spot in the ill-fated Tweed; and it was that gentleman's graphic account of the wreck that excited so much interest at the time of his unfortunate experience.

THE STANFIELD MURDERS.—(From a Norwich Correspondent.)—You will, I am sure, cheerfully correct an error into which your sa well as the other metropolitan journals have fallen, relative to the survivors in the late catastrophe at Stanfield Hall. So far from fears being entertained for the ultimate recovery of Mrs. Jermy and Eliza Chestney, as you have stated, they are progressing favourably and are anticipating what their friends could expect. The accouchement of Emily Sandford, the principal witness, took place on Thursday night last (the 15th); she will, therefore, without doubt, be able to appear at the assizes, according to which had been previously fixed.—Norwich, Feb. 20

ANALYSIS OF THE GOLD FROM CALIFORNIA.—An analysis of some Californian gold has been furnished to a Correspondent of the Mining Journal, by Mr. R. Hunt, F.R.S. It was in the form of small irregular flattened scales, or spangles, varying in weight from 1-20th of a grain to 2 or 3 grains. The mineral pieces weighing as much as 32 to 39 grains. The specific gravity was 15 96. It contained, in 100 parts:

Gold,	..	..	..	..	88·75
Silver	..	..	..	..	8·88
Copper	..	..	..	..	2·25
Siliceous residue	..	..	..	..	1·40

EMIGRATION TO CALIFORNIA.—THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS.—On Tuesday week Swansea was quite enlivened in consequence of the arrival of several waggons loaded with luggage, attended by some scores of the "bold peasantry" of Carmarthenshire, and almost an equal number of the inhabitants of Merthyr, and the surrounding districts, together with their families. The formidable party were nearly all "Latter-day Saints," and came to the town for the purpose of proceeding to Liverpool in the Troubadour steamer, where a ship is in readiness to transport them nex week to the glittering regions of California. The company is under the command of a popular saint, known as Captain Dan Jones. Amongst the group were many substantial farmers from the neighbourhoods of Brecknia and Llanybydder, Carmarthenshire; and although they were well to do, they disposed of their possessions, to get to California, their new Jerusalem, as they deem it, where their fanaticism leads them to believe they will escape from the general destruction and conflagration that is shortly to envelope the earth. It is their intention not to visit the gold regions, but the agricultural districts, where they intend, they say, by helping one another, to realize in peace and harmony, and to exemplify the truth of "brotherly love," not in name, but in practice. Amongst the number are several aged men, varying from 70 to 90 years of age, and whose "hoary locks" not only proclaim their "lengthened years," but render it very improbable they will live to see America; yet so deluded are the poor and simple "Saints," that they believe th[illegible] sh-m, however infirm and old they may be, [illegible] safely, as they started from Wales. [illegible] sunday morning, after being addressed by their leader, all repair[illegible] in admirable order, and with extraordinary resignation Their departure was witnessed by hundreds of spectators, and whilst the steamer gaily passed down the river, the Saints commenced singing a favourite hymn. On entering the pier, however, they abruptly stopped singing, and loudly responded to the cheering with which they were greeted by the inhabitants.

PROCESSION OF THE DEPUTIES OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY, AT ROME.

THE ROMAN NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

In our Journal of last week we briefly announced the opening of the Constituent Assembly at Rome, on the 5th inst. We are now enabled by our Artist in that city to present to our readers a picture of the pageant scene of stated to be "the most imposing spectacle of the many sights which have enlivened the principal thoroughfares for the last three years. The National Assembly, having performed its devotions at the church of Ara Coeli, on the Capitol, issued forth, each member decked with the Italian tricolor scarf, and proceeded to the Senate-house. There were certainly 50,000 spectators along the line of procession, and the retinue which honoured and supported the new depositories of supreme power in Rome, including the whole garrison, magistracy, various public officials and civic guard, formed a moving mass of near 20,000 men, which took two hours to traverse the Corso. When they had taken their seats, the public galleries being filled to inconvenience, their appearance was something solemn and at the same time singular, inasmuch as, though mostly men beyond the middle age, they generally wore copious beards."

THE PROCESSION OF THE DEPUTIES,

THE ILLUMINATIONS.

At night the city presented a gay scene of rejoicing, as shown in the second Illustration, where the Capitol is seen brilliantly illuminated.

TORCHLIGHT PROCESSION.

(See the Illustration upon the front page.)

On the evening of the day of the Proclamation of the Republic there was a procession by torchlight, through the streets of Rome, by ranks of men, the foremost of them wearing civil coats and liberty caps; one carrying a large tricolour flag; others bearing torches; and followed by a vast crowd of people. The first rank of the procession is supposed to have been hired for the occasion, to aid in this republican demonstration.

Deposition of the Pope.—The intelligence from "the eternal City" this week confirms the short account which we gave in the Postcript of our last Number on this subject.

In the sitting of the Constituent Assembly, on the evening of the 8th inst., M Savini proposed the following decree for the establishment of the Republic:—

"Art. 1. Papacy has fallen, de facto and de jure, from the temporal throne of the Roman State. Art. 2. The Roman Pontiff shall enjoy all the guarantees necessary for the exercise of his spiritual power. Art. 3. The Government of the Roman State is to be a pure democracy, and to assume the glorious name of the Roman Republic. Art. 4. The Roman Republic shall maintain with the rest of Italy relations required by a common nationality."

M. Mamiani admitted that the temporal dominion of the Popes had ever been a scourge for Italy, but he contended that in the present situation of Europe it would be impossible to establish a republic in Rome. He accordingly demanded that the question be left to the decision of the Italian Constituent. This course was warmly combatted, and ultimately the Assembly decreed, by a majority of 136 votes out of 144, the downfall of the Pope; and by 120, the establishment of the Republic. At 2 o'clock P.M. on the 9th the Republican flag was hoisted on the tower of the capitol, and saluted by 101 guns fired by the Castle of St. Angelo. On the same day, the Assembly voted the following decree:—1. Until the constitution of the Roman Republic shall have been decreed and enforced, the constituent Assembly will govern the State by means of an executive committee. 2. The executive committee shall be composed of three Italians, responsible and revocable at the will of the Assembly. 3. The Executive Committee is composed of the citizens, Armellini, who received 139 votes; Saffeatti, 114; and Mathias Mastecchi, 85 votes; and an address to the people of Tuscany, congratulating them on having effected a similar revolution to that of Rome, was unanimously voted.

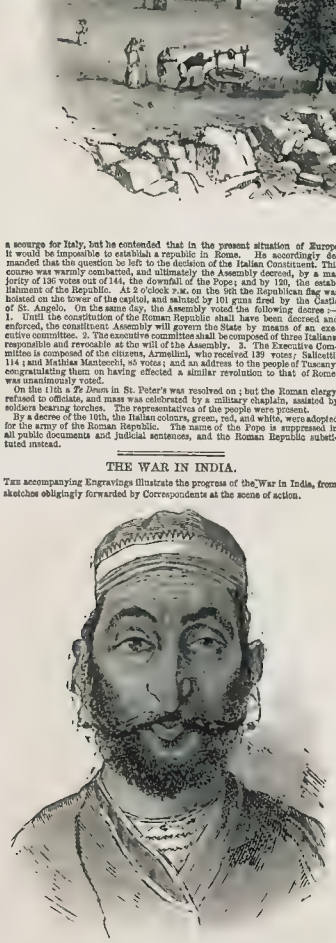
On the 12th a Te Deum in St. Peter's was resolved on; but the Roman clergy refused to officiate, and mass was celebrated by a military chaplain, assisted by soldiers bearing torches. The representatives of the people were present.

By a decree of the 10th, the Italian colours, green, red, and white, were adopted for the army of the Roman Republic. The name of the Pope is suppressed in all public documents and judicial sentences, and the Roman Republic substituted instead.

THE WAR IN INDIA.

THE accompanying Engravings illustrate the progress of the War in India, from sketches obligingly forwarded by Correspondents at the scene of action.



SIKH CHIEF.—FROM A SKETCH BY G. T. VIGNE, ESQ.

In the first Illustration is shown a portion of the Governor-General's Camp pitched on the plain opposite the city of Delhi, to await the arrival of his Lordship. The sketch was taken from the top of one of the grand entrances to the city, called the Cashmi Gate. This, however forms but a small portion of the Governor-General's Camp, and was pitched merely for his personal use. The Camp, when accompanied by all the departments and officers of the government, forms a very magnificent spectacle. Our Correspondent adds:—

"The departure of the Governor-General from the seat of Government, towards the north-west, is an event occasioned by the troubled state of the Punjaub; a similar cause called Lords Ellenborough and Hardinge to the same scene. The mistakes of a former administration, which have now become apparent, are to undergo another grand settlement, which will most probably be the permanent annexation of the Punjaub to the British empire. A strong and vigorous military rule, however, will be necessary for four or five years, until the change of Government is begun to be understood and appreciated by the turbulent inhabitants of the country; and afterwards, when the country is well settled and subdued, the civil power may gradually assume its due influence. A too hasty substitution of the latter for military rule, however, is sure to be followed by the same consequences that have hitherto attended such policy; another widespread outbreak, another series of delays, and shifting of responsibility, attendant upon all transactions of a civil nature in this country, and it en another ruinous and expensive war.

"The mistake seems to be this: that, instead of subjecting the country to military rule, as was done in Scinde for the first few years after its conquest, a rule which is at once energetic in its character, which has the immediate power of enforcing its mandates, and where the awful fear of responsibility does not hang so heavily as it does on the individuals composing a Civil Government; instead of this, the country was treated as a peaceable and well settled province of our own, where no military commander can act but after a series of delays, consequent on numerous references to different civil authorities in departments of government, all of whom necessarily finding a business of this kind foreign to their routine, and having no power to give any positive instructions in so unexpected a crisis, are compelled to refer the matter to the Government at the Presidency. The evil having in the meantime spread and become formidable, further instructions become requisite; and at last the whole business has to be made over, as in the present instance, to the highest military authority, for another final settlement of the affairs of the country, to be effected by the assembling of a large army, and by a second invasion and conquest of the country."

BENGAL ENGINEER OFFICERS TRACING THE APPROACHES TO A FORTIFIED CITY AT NIGHT.

BENGAL ENGINEER OFFICERS.

This sketch represents a party of Engineer officers tracing the approaches to a fortified city. This is usually performed at dusk; and when marked out, the working parties drawn from the lines commence excavating, and during the night continue their labour. Each morning the garrison sees these trenches brought nearer and nearer to their defences, until batteries are constructed close to them, from whence a breach is made in the walls. These officers are accompanied by a party of Sappers in their working dress, who, with dark lantern, tape, and pegs, mark out what the officers have traced. We are indebted for this sketch to Lieut. E. F. Atkinson, of the Bengal Engineers.

INDIA.—CAPTURE OF MOULTAN.

The accounts anticipatory of the Overland Mail, which reached town on Thursday, contain news of much interest. The dates are, Bombay the 19th, Calcutta the 8th, and Moultan the 7th of January. In our last notice of Indian affairs the stationary attitude of the forces before the city of Moultan was mentioned; the necessary reinforcements had not then come up to render the success of an attack free from all doubt

On the 21st of December the Bombay troops joined General Whish, and the besieging party then amounted to 15,000 British troops, the allies counting about 17,000; or 22,000 in all. The artillery consisted of 150 pieces of ordnance, of which nearly one-half were of the largest calibre. On Christmas day and the day following the force changed ground; on the 27th the troops advanced in four columns to the attack, and, clearing the suburbs and driving in the enemy on all sides, established themselves within five hundred yards of the walls. Batteries were constructed in every direction, and on the morning of the 28th a terrific cannonade and bombardment commenced. On the 29th the heavy guns were battering within eighty yards of the ramparts. On the morning of the 30th the principal magazine in the fort blew up with a terrific explosion—nearly 800,000 lbs. of powder are reported to have been stored in it—blowing a vast column of dust a thousand feet up into the air. The destruction it caused around was tremendous. A conflagration, supposed to be that of the principal stores, immediately commenced spreading in the town, which proved destructive to £50,000 worth of grain, as was subsequently ascertained. The enemy's artillery slackened their fire, but still continued unsilenced. On the two next days, the cannonade continued; shells were thrown sometimes every minute, sometimes at intervals of ten minutes, and fearful salvos were from time to time discharged from the heavy batteries. A furious cannonade having been kept up all the previous night, on the morning of the 2nd of January a column of Bengal troops, commanded by Colonel Franks, consisting of her Majesty's 32nd, and the 49th and 72nd Native Infantry, pushed forward to a breach near the Delhi Gate, where they found the enemy determined to oppose them to the last. The breach, besides, proved impracticable; so the troops retired, and moved round to the opposite side of the town, where the entrance of the Bombay column had already been effected. The breach stormed by them had been much more complete than the other, and the enemy defending it were driven off at the bayonet's point. The Fushiers entered first, and speedily placed their standard within the walls of the town. The Bengal column followed them, and the city of Moultan, which was captured about three P.M., was before sunset filled with British troops. The fire from the fort, which had for a time slackened, was meanwhile renewed, and in the course of the night a shell was sprung on our troops, which occasioned some mischief. Moolraj seemed determined to maintain himself to the last, and showed no sign of fear amidst all his reverses. On the morning of the 3rd our commander was again received, and the Dowlut Gate, the last hold of the enemy, destroyed. Large quantities of plunder were collected by the troops after their entry into the city, and the bankers were said to have offered £20,000 if their establishments were left unmolested. The casualties on our side are pretty numerous, as might be expected, where so gallant a resistance was made, but a complete list has not appeared in the English papers of the mail.

The Citadel of Moultan still held out up to the 6th of January, the latest date in these accounts, but it was being mined, with the object of blowing the counterscarp into the ditch, and then taking the place by storm.

From the Punjaub we learn that the inactivity of the grand army under the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Gough, still continued, but active operations may be expected to be resumed when the required troops are concentrated. Meanwhile the Sikhs themselves remain quiet. With Lord Gough and 20,0.0 men in their front on their left flank and rear, they will speedily have General Ashmuthy with 8000 or 10,000 on their right flank, and no assurance promising from any quarter; and this disposition of forces, together with the tidings of the fall of Moultan, will quickly lead to the renewal of hostilities. Brigadier White and force had rejoined the camp of the Commander-in-Chief on the afternoon of the 4th. He had not seen or heard of any enemy. His object was two-fold—to intercept Sumla Singh, should he make his appearance, and to prevent any attempt the insurgents under Shere Singh might make to detach a force to the assistance of Moolraj—an object at one time said to be in contemplation. Chuttur Singh continued to hover about on the hills, with some 4000 or 5000 men under him. He is said to be in communication with a body of Affghans, who have come down under Dost Mahomed or Jubbar Khan, with the view of recovering Peshawur. His purposes are variously represented, but our tidings from this quarter are so discordant that scarcely any faith can be placed in them. Attock still holds out, and is not now likely to surrender. Captain Abbott has escaped the defenders for the offensive, and is laying siege to some strongholds in the Hazareh country. The Governor-General has established his camp close to the battle-field of Sobraon, to be as near as possible to the scene of action.

A force of Affghans, variously estimated at from 6000 to 12,000 men, is reported to have arrived at Quetta, above the Bolan Pass.

The alliance between the Sikhs and Affghans is one of the worst features of the whole business connected with the second Punjaub war.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1849.

THE Overland Mail of the 19th of January, from Bombay, brings intelligence from Moultan of the 6th, from the camp of Lord Gough to the 5th, and from Calcutta to the 8th. It confirms the anticipations brought by the mail previous, that a vigorous attack would be made upon Moultan about Christmas, preparatory to a more decisive effort against Shere Singh. The operations under General Whish began on the 27th of December, by an attack upon two several points of the suburbs, in which, and in the various operations that were continued until the afternoon of the 2nd of January, the British and native forces of the East India Company displayed their customary valour. The suburbs were carried at the bayonet's point, and after bombardments, breach, and storm, lasting, with but slight intervals of repose, for six days, the British flag was planted upon the walls of Moultan by a sergeant-major of the Company's Fusileers. This happened at three o'clock in the afternoon of the 2nd of January; and by sunset the town was fully in our possession. Fourteen guns, twenty-five elephants, a great number of horses, and a very large supply of grain were found in the town. Moolraj, with a body of about 1100 troops—all that remained to him out of the 9000 that formed his garrison when the attack commenced—took refuge in the citadel, and still held out on the 6th of January, the day at which the last advices left. It was not probable, however, that his defence could be protracted for many hours. He had proposed to treat with the besieging force, but the only option left him by General Whish was immediate and unconditional surrender. The loss on the part of the British is comparatively small; that of the Sikhs is represented as very great.

Moultan being thus disposed of, we may expect that Lord Gough will speedily give an account of the principal chief of the rebellion. It was stated in the last advices, that his Lordship had moved up to the rear of General Thackwell's division. The latter, it will be remembered, crossed the Chenab, above Ramnuggur, in pursuit of the retreating forces of Shere Singh, and came in sight of the new position of that leader, whom he found, strongly entrenched, with all his bag and baggage, and in excellent condition for making a protracted defence. The divisions under Lord Gough and General Thackwell now form one camp disposed in parallel lines, with the principal artillery on the left front flank, and Lord Gough in the rear, within a short distance of the famous field of Sobraon. The main body of the Sikhs continued to hold their former strong position, somewhat further removed from the bank of the Jhelum, but flanked and covered by the stream and by a thick jungle. A report was current in India, that the Affghans, under Dost Mahommed, had invaded Scinde; but it requires confirmation.

THE proclamation of a Republic in Rome, and the flight of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, are events of grave importance. The two most liberal Sovereigns of Europe, Leopold, Grand Duke of Tuscany, and Pius the Ninth—Sovereigns who were anxious to grant to their subjects every freedom that rational man could desire, and who, so far from impeding the course of enlightened reform, put themselves as its head to direct it—have been overwhelmed by the advancing wave of Revolution. They are at this moment fugitives from their dominions, abandoned by the ungrateful people whom they made so many efforts and so many sacrifices to serve; while their respective countries are involved in all the turmoil and confusion of a quasi-anarchy.

The Congress at Brussels, which was originally summoned to deliberate upon the affairs of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and upon those of Naples and Sicily, may, with advantage, leave these affairs to themselves. They have been summarily settled, for a time at least, by the strong arm of Marshal Radetzki and the good fortune of the King of Naples, and will give no immediate trouble either to Italy or to Europe. But the affairs of Rome and Florence will demand all the care and attention of the statesmen who are interested in the present, as well as proximate, happiness and prosperity of Italy; and the Congress will do well to look upon the Italian question as one in this respect, and devise some measures which shall satisfy the reasonable demands of the people, who desire responsible Government in all the States. Florence has proclaimed a Republic, and her union with Rome. There are now three Republics in Italy, the Papal State, Tuscany, and the city of Venice; and so far, the projects of those who dream of converting the whole of the Peninsula into a Confederation of Republics have marched onwards to completion. But it is not probable that they will advance much further. Whatever may be the case in the city of Venice, the people of Tuscany and Rome are far from unanimous in their support of, or attachment to, a Republican form of Government, even if administered by better men than those who have been cast upwards at the present time by the storm of Revolution; and it is to be doubted whether, even without the intervention of the States who are interested in the restoration of the temporal sovereignty of the Pope, the Roman Republic has any better chance of success than the Red Republic of Citizen Barbès. The overthrow of the Republic in Rome will be the overthrow of the Republic in Florence; and it appears doubtful whether the first will last many months or even weeks. There was danger that a restoration of the Pope effected by the bayonets of a foreign power, might have proved a restoration of little avail and of short duration; but if the restoration be effected by Austria, by Naples, and upon a basis that will leave to the Romans the constitutional liberties which the Pope has always desired to grant them—or, better still, if it be effected by the returning good sense of the Roman people—there will be a much greater chance of stability in the arrangement, and of prosperity to the Romans. It is asserted and believed that such an intervention has been contemplated, with the concurrence of all the great Powers of Europe, but that the question as regards the spiritual and temporal power of the Pope is so delicate and complicated, that we may well doubt whether any immediate steps will be taken. It is obvious policy, moreover, to allow the Roman Republic to play its own game for awhile. If the Powers of Europe are wise, cautious, and forbearing, and if Naples and London will look on tranquilly, the Romans themselves may spare them all anxiety, and open their arms to give Pius the Ninth a new trial in Constitutional Government. Were this to ensue, the ultra-democratic cause in Tuscany would collapse also, and a new experiment might commence for the tranquillisation and enfranchisement of Italy. Under all circumstances, however censuring the present aspect of affairs may be in Italy, the best policy of all parties is to wait.

IT is asserted that a scheme for the removal of the Stamping Office, from the present convenient locality in Somerset House, to the office of Excise in Broad-street, has been determined upon by the heads of the Consolidated Board of Excise and Stamps. Did the information not reach us upon unquestionable authority, we could not credit that a project so unnecessary, so inconvenient, and so vexatious, had been contemplated for an instant. It is possible that such an arrangement might save a little trouble to one or two public functionaries; but it seems to us that the public convenience has to be consulted in these matters, in preference to the ease of well-paid officials. We hope that our contemporaries, one and all, will unite with us in deprecating such a removal. The present offices in Somerset house are, in every respect, admirably adapted for their purpose; and to remove them into the heart of the City would not only cause much trouble, annoyance, and loss of time to members of the legal profession and their clients, but to all persons engaged in the newspaper business it would amount to an inconvenience of a very serious character. In the behalf of solicitors, and of the legal profession generally, we would remark, that the Stamp-office, at present, is in convenient proximity to Westminster Hall and to the Inns of Court; and that to drag these gentlemen down to Broad-street, for the convenience of the Consolidated Board, would inflict a great hardship upon a large class of respectable and busy men (to say nothing of their clients, who would have to pay for this extra trouble and loss of time), which would not be compensated by any public advantage whatsoever. Though the interests of newspapers may seem a small matter to official gentlemen, we would, nevertheless, represent even in their behalf that large numbers of newspaper offices have been established in the Strand, for the sole reason of the proximity of that street to the present Stamping Office. Of course, were any public advantage to be derived from the change, the newspapers, however they might dislike it, would quietly submit; but in a case where the removal—if it be really in contemplation—can only be the result of thoughtlessness or caprice, we trust that the interests of newspapers, identical as they are in this instance with those of the legal profession, will not be lost sight of by those who have the power to prevent the scheme from being carried into effect. Cheapside, as every one knows, is already more than sufficiently encumbered with vehicles; and it certainly would not increase the amenity of that thoroughfare, either to pedestrians or to riders in public or private vehicles, if it daily and hourly received the addition of carts laden with reams of paper on the way to and from the Excise Office in Broad-street. We trust, upon every ground, that the subject will receive proper notice; and that the idea of a change, if ever seriously recommended, will be forthwith abandoned.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT AT GLASGOW.

On Saturday evening, about half-past seven o'clock, one of the most fearful catastrophes that ever occurred in Scotland took place in the Theatre Royal, Dunlop-street, Glasgow. Shortly after the performance had commenced, an alarm was given that a fire had broken out in the upper gallery, and the audience, which was very numerous there, became much excited, and were in a few moments seized with a most unruly panic. In their efforts to escape down the narrow spiral staircase, which formed the only means of egress from the gallery, a large number of persons were crushed and smothered to death. The cause of the fire was a leak in the gas-pipe, near the iron railing which was exploded by a lucifer match used by some one to light his pipe. Scarcely any damage was done to the theatre by the fire, which was of no moment, and was extinguished almost immediately. The scene which the theatre presented at the time of the accident was appalling. The audience rushed down stairs in the terror of some undefined calamity; but most lamentably they were brought to a halt by some of them stumbling at the first landing above the flight of stairs from the street door. They crushed upon each other so rapidly that they soon formed a compact mass, and all chance of escape was gone. Those behind, unaware of the nature of this obstruction, and hearing the shrieks of those who pressed on more furiously than ever, only, of course, to augment the catastrophe. The pressure on the staircase was aggravated by the crowds in front, for want of fresh air. The weaker were trampled down by others, who were only to be trampled down in turn by the fresh and furious in the rear. The noise of the shrill cries and groans, and of the struggles for bare life, which came from this horrid staircase, were most agonizing; and even those who could not reach it, but were compelled to remain in the spacious gallery, whereby their lives were saved, set up dreadful yells. This shocking scene lasted for several minutes, and many gentlemen in other parts of the house made generous and noble efforts to reach the spot; but they were unsuccessful, for the lower staircase was jammed by the dead and the dying, and the entrances to the upper gallery was crowded by the frantic crowd. At length an entrance was effected. The authorities were very soon at the theatre, and, while assistance was being procured, the gallery staircase was ascended, when at one of the landing places was discovered a scene of the most terrifying description—men, women, and children huddled together, trodden under foot, dead and dying. The poor creatures were then carried down to human appliances and every exertion used to restore animation, but, unfortunately, these exertions were in few instances successful, for most of them were dead, and those sent to the Royal Infirmary, two died upon the way, and one shortly after. Eleven persons, slightly bruised, were able to be removed to their homes, and others were consigned to the Infirmary in a dangerous state. The 61 dead bodies were, in the course of the evening, removed to the Clyde-street Hospital, and there kept till Sunday morning for identification, when the relatives of the poor creatures, who had been waiting in hundreds around the hospital during the night, were admitted. The bodies were laid on the floor of the large shed, and when each relative, father, mother, wife, or other friends, were recognised, their shrieks rent the air! One woman claimed three as her own. Without one single exception the sufferers belonged to the humbler class of society, and were for the most part lads between 14 and 17 years old. There were but two or three females amongst the dead: one was a little girl of three years of age.

A gloom has been cast over the city by the fearful occurrence, which it will require some time to dissipate.

SOUTH-STAFFORDSHIRE ELECTION.

—Lord Lewisham, eldest son of the Earl of Dartmouth, was returned on Monday, at Lichfield, to fill the seat in the House of Commons vacated by Lord Ingestre's succession to the Upper House as Earl Talbot, in succession to his late father. Lord Lewisham was proposed by C. F. Forster, Esq., banker of Walsall, and seconded by G. B. Thorneycroft, Esq., a large ironmaster. There was no other candidate. On returning thanks, the noble Lord stated, that, if he had been in Parliament when the abolition of the corn-laws was proposed, he should certainly have voted against the measure, and that he entertained great doubts of the success of free-trade.

ELOPEMENT PREVENTED BY TELEGRAPH.

—On Saturday evening last information by telegraph was transmitted from Cambridge to the London [illegible] left her parental roof, and requesting her detention at the station in arrest of arrival per rail, until a relative resident at the west end of London could be made acquainted with her elopement. The telegraph was accordingly again in requisition, and every precaution adopted. Among the passengers of the eleven o'clock train was a lady dressed in pink-coloured satin and wrapped in a gray mantle; she was handed from a first-class carriage by a gentleman in a white Chesterfield, their only luggage a small carpet-bag. So accurately had the lady's appearance been described, that identity was established, and, while the party leaving the platform, they were politely informed that instructions had been received which would preclude the possibility of the lady's departure until the arrival of a relative. Astonishment at this unexpected detainer was succeeded by chagrin, mingled with vows of reciprocal love and eternal constancy, interrupted by the sudden appearance of the lady's uncle, who, by means of the telegraph, had been enabled to arrive shortly after the runaways. Placing his nieces in a cab, the old gentleman drove off, leaving the disappointed swain in deep dejection. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] thoroughfares was even sadder and more deserted than on the Sunday. The joy and glory of the Parisian, the bœuf gras of old tradition, with his Cupid on his back, and his attendant train of savages and knights, had been, nevertheless, suppressed. In the eyes of the Parisian bourgeoisie, this absence of the emblem of the Carnival itself, was lamented most feelingly. The police it is true, had done its traditionary duty. In sending forth a few cart-loads of shivering "masks" to simulate a people's gaiety, as has been the wont of the Parisian police under all régimes: but these draggle-tail dresses, which speedily disappeared, and a few mud-bespattered children, looking wofully unhappy in their costumes, were all the evidences of a people's mirth which the last days of the Carnival could afford. Miserable as was the attempt, however, to revive the semblance of old follies, it must be said that, under the circumstances, the fœurs gras of 1849 formed even a pleasant contrast to the sad days of the same period in the preceding year, when all Paris was imperatively enjoined by a dictatorial Provisional Government to put on its best attire, couleur de rose, and yet persisted in dressing itself in mourning, or, at best, in the dirty blouses of yelling heroes of the barricades.

The event of the week, in the annals of Republican fashion, has been the ball of the Presidency on Friday last. It was gay, splendid, well-arranged, lively, and pleasant. The rooms were beautifully lighted; the long flower gallery, connecting the main wings of the building; a former orangerie of the Restoration presented ' and redolent jardin d'hiver, with occasional bouquets for flirtations; toilettes were fresh and glittering; and the President of the Republic himself did the honours of his Republican palace with much grace and courtesy, although with the not over-exaggerated air of a man born to command, and restored to the position marked out for him by destiny. All this was splendid; but, "by the soul of Robespierre!" what food for ultra-democratic clamour did the Elysée (ex-Bourbon) afford! Not a Montagnard was to be seen among the gay crowd; not a sans-culotte had been invited to typify the enthusiastic watchwords of the Republic! Still worse, the salons were thronged with all the fashionables of the Faubourg St. Germain, of more than suspected tendencies. Representatives of the old noblesse abounded—the Montmorencys, Noailles, Beaufremonts, Beauvesns, and tutti quanti: the habitués of the old exclusive circles seemed to form the veritable nucleus of the society chosen by the Republic's President. Not only the actual corps diplomatique, as of course, but ex-ambassadors, dismissed as "reactionary" by revolutionary Governments, but still lingering in Paris, were to be seen among the notabilities. Well might the Montagnard journals scream, "Treason in the Republic! La patrie est en danger!" Not even the fusion and fraternity of literature and art were properly represented, cry the unhappy organs of ultra-democracy. Except M. Victor Hugo, Girardin, and a very few more authors and journalists of the Moderate party, who are otherwise political notabilities, not an "illustration" of Pétitjean could be found. It was to be remarked at the same time, that there was no seeming predominance of any Bonapartist party, or even of the soi-disant of the Empire. The President's belle cousine, Madame Demidoff, served only as a family notability by the splendour of her diamonds. With the exception of the apparition of Madame Victor Hugo, in a sort of wild sibyl-like coiffure, which attracted many smiling remarks from female exquisites, the whole fête presented the old scene of a "bal de grand monde": "under the tyrant;" and had it not been for the black coats and "ditoes to match" of the numerous civilian élégants, which, after all, predominated over the military uniforms, and the absence of an established court-dress, habitués of Paris might have imagined themselves at a court ball of the ex-King; only, they all declared that it was far more elegant, far more pleasant, far more distingué. Built in the beginning of the last century, inhabited by Madame de Pompadour; then Royal property; confiscated only under the first Republic, to be opened to the famous orgies of the Directory; then occupied by the Bonaparte family, and by the Emperor of Russia in 1815; then once more Royal property, and inhabited for a time by the Duke and Duchess of Berri, to become, under the reign of Louis Philippe, a sort of regal hotel for foreign personages of distinction—among whom may be numbered Ibrahim Pacha—and destined for the future residence of the Queen of the French, as widow, the Elysée (ex-Bourbon) in spite of its temporary revolutionary changes, has evidently too strong aristocratic tendencies still lurking about it, not to be denounced by Republican democrats as giving shelter still to habits of infamous aristocratic reactionism.

Another scene has lately afforded a far sadder proof of the effects of revolution. The sale of the splendid furniture of the once rich and gay Hôtel Lafitte may be recorded among the revolutionary events of the week. Once the Hôtel d'Artois and a quasi-regal palace, the building fell from its "high estate" beneath the sound shaking of a revolution to become the residence of the not less regal splendours of the banking world of Louis Philippe's reign, when a nation was supposed to present it to the "Patriot Lafitte," and the very street changed its proper name for his. A second revolution has thrown down again the power of the monied world; and the failure of the bank Lafitte-Gouin has delivered the splendid hôtel to an auction-room public.

The sale of the stud of the late King—although, from the prices fetched, it formed a striking contrast to those first days of the Republic when men turned their horses loose into the Champs Elysées rather than keep them, and unable to sell them—has also had its semi-political significance.

In spite of the importance of the late foreign political events, more especially in Italy, the Parisian world seems inclined to pay them little attention, so pre-occupied is it with its own position and its own domestic anxieties. Even the "interpellations" of Ledru-Rollin in the Assembly, upon the subject of Italian affairs, although conducted with outrage and tumult in the Chamber itself, could scarcely rouse the public from its foreign apathy. The Assembly, however, has contrived to make "a sensation" whenever any domestic topic for riot and recrimination has been eagerly snatched at; and the outrageously indecent conduct of the Montagne, in attacking M. de Montalambert with every species of injurious epithet, when speaking upon the electoral law; the altercation between M. Decôjoy and M. Etienne Arago on the same occasion, which nearly led to "fisty-cuffs" in the very hall itself; and the howlings of the "Highlanders," upon the occasion of the protestations of General Cavaignac against the subversive intentions imputed to him by the Union paper, when the Minister of the Interior and Chancellor spoke, have, by keeping up its habitual tumultuous and acrimonious character, and showing the convulsive struggles of the Montagne, the more and more near it approaches to its probable dissolution, attracted public attention and comment enough. This sound of the "death rattle" in the throat of the Mountain has latterly become something truly "infernal." Meanwhile, daily reviews, sometimes in presence of the President himself, and the sweeping of the troops along the streets, seem to show the necessity of intimidation by the display of force. In spite of the struggles of the Reds, all the bonnets rouges remaining on the so-called trees of liberty have been taken down, by superior order, amidst the acclamations of the "people" looking on. The anniversaries of February are at hand. The "Reds" clamour against the funereal air given to the proposed fêtes by the Government. How will they pass off? At all events, not with a people's joy. "THE LAST DROP."—STATUE IN MARBLE.—BY W. CALDER MARSHALL, A.R.A., AT THE EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

SECOND NOTICE.

We resume our Illustrations, this week, of the newly-opened Exhibition at the British Institution. In selecting our Engravings, we have endeavoured, as on former occasions, to represent the several classes of works of art, that o[illegible] readers at a distance, who have not the opportu[illegible] advantage of seeing and judging for themse[illegible] may form, even in Australia, a clearer and better notion of what the exhibition is like, than any description in words alone can possibly supply. In our last week's paper, Mr. Creswick and Mr. Branwhite will be found representing the landscape part of the exhibition; Mr. F. Goodall, the subject and figure part from every day life; and Mr Johnston, in his illustration of a beautiful passage in the pastoral drama of the "Gentle Shepherd," another description of painting which, for want of a better term, we shall call the poetic portion of the art. This week we are somewhat different. Mr. Marshall represents the sculpture as he always does wherever he is placed, most worthily; and Mr. Jutsum's "Harvest Field" supplies a sound taste of the largest class of works of Art in the Exhibition, already represented by Mr. Creswick's "Stepping Stones," in our last week's paper, and with which we had possibly been content but for the varied merits of Mr. Jutsum's picture, and the claim which so fruitful a class of art must necessarily put forward of returning at least two members to represent its interests and excellences in the pages of our paper.

It seems only right that the country which has produced the greatest number of descriptive poets should produce, at the same time, the greatest number of landscape painters. Few countries possess so many exquisite and varied landscape beauties as the three kingdoms over which Queen Victoria reigns. Other nations have not the same class of purely descriptive poets as we have. There is no poem similar to "The Seasons" in any other language. "The Task" abounds in passages of which Hobbema alone of Continental artists can be said to supply a single illustration. And then we have our local poets, with their poems in praise of particular localities, like Denham's "Cooper's Hill," Garth's "Claremont," Waller's "St. James's Park," Dyer's "Grongar Hill," Kirke White's "Clifton Grove," and Mr. Crowe's "Lewesdon Hill." Nor are our painters inferior to our poets in representing English scenery as English scenery deserves to be represented. Our earliest English landscape painter of any merit was Richard Wilson; and though he had spent many of the best years of his life in transferring to canvas "the green delights," as Thomson calls them, and bright blue skies of southern Italy, yet it is marvellous how much he was at home in his native Wales, and how exquisitely he has felt and caught the verdure, light, and character of an English landscape, and how true he is, in scenes like those he has painted on the banks of the Dee, to the pastoral scenery and poetry of England. Our second great landscape painter was Gainsborough; and Gainsborough, it is well known, was never out of England, while his landscapes shew how thoroughly he understood, and how much he was at all times among us. Since these two great painters established our school of landscape painting, we have produced Mr. J. M. W. Turner and Mr. John Martin (the most imaginative of the school), Sir A. Calcott and Mr. Constable, Mr. Girtin and Mr. C. Fielding, Mr. Patrick Nasmyth and Mr. F. R. Lee, Mr. Creswick and Mr. Clarkson Stanfield, Mr. Danby and that long class of well-filled scholars represented in the present Exhibition by Mr. D. Cooke, Mr. Redgrave, Mr. Vickers, Mr. C. A. Stanley, Mr. Holland, Mr. Linton, Mr. J. W. Allen, Mr. Jutsum, Mr. Branwhite, and the younger Danbys. Mr. Cooke excels in rendering scenes in Holland and on the coast, such as Vanderveldt loved to paint; Mr. Redgrave delights in green lanes and the inmost recesses of a shady wood, where old trunks, and young timber, and spring-time leaves, compose a scene of cheerful seclusion; Mr. Vickers rejoices in scenes like those on the Derwent and in the Vale of Neath, and at times catches their beauties with no common pencil; Mr. C. R. Stanley looks up to Mr. Creswick with the fondness of a scholar, and not unfrequently, as in "The Approach to the Avenue," No. 481 in the present Exhibition, emulates his master on his own ground; Mr. Jutsum, it will be seen from our present paper, delights in hay-fields, worthy of De Wint; Mr. Branwhite, as our last week's paper has already made known, can throw when he pleases a melancholy grandeur over a landscape of his own composition; while the younger Danbys, Mr. T. Danby especially, look on Nature with observant eyes, and catch her noonday effects in pleasant vallies with unerring accuracy, and a beauty in parts not commonly seen in other artists.

Among poetic and fancy heads—almost approaching portraiture, but in some instances above it—Mr. Frank Stone contributes two pretty composition portraits, which will find, as they deserve to find, many admirers. His "Girl of Brittany," No. 2, reminds us not unpleasantly of G. S. Newton; his "Alice," the companion, is in his own clever and unmistakeable style. "A Naiad," by Mr. Frost, A.R.A., is worthy of the pencil which has done so much for the illustration of Spenser and Milton. Mrs. Carpenter is still unexcelled in stamping on the portraits of her children a healthy English life, such as Gainsborough loved, and is now almost lost to our school of infant portraiture. Mr. Joy can copy a pretty face when he pleases; Mr. Woolmer avail himself of little incidents raising portraiture out of its ordinary level; and Mr. H. W. Phillips paint at times with his father's pencil. We could wish that Mr. Inskipp would be less like himself. he has a genius for art, but he sadly misemploys it.

In the History and Subject department, Mr. Martin leads the way with his "Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still." Mr. Danby follows hard at his heels with his "Mountain Chieftain's Funeral in olden times." There is a melancholy grandeur and minute finish about this picture, in spite of its extreme darkness, that seems at first sight to swallow up everything. But it will bear looking into. Mr. Johnston contributes the "Trial of Archbishop Laud" to our long list of painted trials with which we have of late years been somewhat too fruitful. It is clever. Mr. Linnell has "A Flight into Egypt" in his usual manner, well conceived and well coloured, but the figures sadly deficient in dignity. Mr. J. E. Lauder has "A Scene from the Taming of the Shrew," and Mr. R. S. Lauder a very able picture of "Burns and Captain Grose," but which might bear any other name, for we are quite at a loss to understand the propriety of its present appellation. The accessories are painted with admirable finish, and the figure and face of Burns conceived with great dignity. This is certainly one of the best pictures in the Exhibition. Mr. Joy has chosen a bad subject in his "Fox and Napoleon." The great Whig statesman was of unwieldy bulk, and Mr. Joy has made him, as other artists must, in some measure, have made him, very little better than a farmer.

In Dutch life and in Dutch detail the two Goodalls are pre-eminent in the present Exhibition. Mr. Wingfield has a minutely faithful picture of the interior of the Gallery at Stafford House. Mr. Lance excels in fruit, and in animal life Mr. Sidney Cooper: Mr. Ansdell and Mr. Herring are as excellent as they have ever been.

Mr. T. F. Marshall contributes "The Playmate's Grave" and "Age and Infancy," subjects of a suggestive character, and prettily and touchingly rendered.

In the Sculpture Department we have Mr Foley's "Ino and Bacchus" (a commission from the Earl of Ellesmere), and Mr. Marshall's "Young Satyr Drinking"—to our tastes worthy of Flamingo or Nicholas Poussin.

THE THEATRES.

ASTLEY'S.

A new grand spectacle, called "Corasco, or the Warrior's Steed," has been produced at this theatre It is written by Mr. Fitzball, and that gentleman's tact and experience in this style of entertainment have resulted in a perfect success; indeed the construction and writing of the drama are far superior to the general run of equestrian pieces—the plot being exceedingly interesting, and the action allowing full scope for the tableaux and pageantry for which this theatre has been noted, time out of mind. The period of the early struggles between the Spaniards and the South American natives has been chosen; and we find that Corasco, a native warrior (Mr. Frederick), is in love with Sobna (Miss E. Henry), and having obtained a victory over the Spaniards, demands her hand. The father consents; but the High Priest, Arsite (Mr. Crowther), being also in love with her, reminds him that the girl has been vowed to the worship of the sun. In spite of the disinclination of the Inca (Mr. Darcie) to see his daughter taken from the world to become a virgin of the sun, the Priest succeeds. At the moment she has been given to Corasco, Arsite enters with his priests, and claims her for the service of the temple. He seizes her, and excites the populace against Corasco, who escapes by means of his steed. In the second act we find Sobna left to watch the sacred fire in the garb of the vestals. By some means, Corasco contrives to gain an entrance to the temple. Whilst he is urging his suit, the holy fire goes out. Knowing the penalty of this inattention he finally persuades her to fly with him. Arsite soon discovers their flight, and pursues them. They are taken. Corasco is wounded; but escapes by means of his steed, who bears him again, in a marvellous manner, from his enemies. Sobna is, however, left in their hands; and she is conveyed to the Temple of the Sun to suffer death for breaking her vows; whilst to add to their misery Arsite has murdered their father, and now reigns absolute in the country. Sobna is condemned to be burnt alive. Corasco, having no other allies, is compelled to call in the aid of the Spaniards. The forces meet; the Priest is killed; and Corasco, having recovered his mistress, is united to her, and crowned as Inca. Of course there was a comic underplot, between Stephano (Mr. Bedford) and Grypo, the cook (Mr. Attwood); both of whom are in love with Kempa (Miss Daly); and these characters made the audience roar again by their comicalities.

Everything has been done for the piece in the way of mise en scène; and, under the able superintendence of Mr. W. West, the groupings and effects were admirably managed. It was also very well acted; and some incidental dancing was very cleverly arranged by Mr. W. H. Harvey. There is no doubt of the drama having a long and lucrative career.

THE BATH AND BRISTOL AMATEURS

The performances of this trouve commenced on Monday evening at the Bristol Theatre, when Sir Bulwer Lytton's "Richelieu" and the late Mr. Lemon Rede's farce of "His First Champagne" were performed, to the great satisfaction of a very full house—the applause being throughout most enthusiastic. The representation of "Richelieu" was a heavy task for amateurs to undertake; but the admirable manner in which it was performed throughout would have done credit to any company, short of the actual "stars" of the profession: indeed, it is very seldom that amateurs have been seen so perfectly at home upon the stage. The real names of the gentlemen engaged in the performance were, for various reasons, suppressed in the bills; but the majority of them were well known in the fashionable circles of the metropolis—the senate, the army, the bar, and the "landed interest" having each contributed their representatives to form the company. Apart from the actor of the principal character

If not [illegible] national business of the stage (which may be, at [illegible]), the [illegible] spoke with the ease and judgment of scholars and gentlemen: the general effect of the ensemble was also heightened by the exceedingly rich style of the costumes, which had been made expressly for the occasion [illegible] library of the Garrick Club.

Mrs Nisbett, who plays Julie de Mortemar, [illegible] received on her entrance, and acted throughout most charmingly. The [illegible] were [illegible] having secured the services of two such excellent artistes. At the fall of the curtain the whole of the dramatis personæ were recalled, and welcomed with the loudest enthusiasm.

An entr'acte, one of the company gave his notions of a "country fair," which was unanimously encored, that the singer was obliged to inform the audience, if ready-made lungs were not procurable at Bristol, to be fitted in at the shortest notice, he could not comply with their request. This was done in a humorous way, which created great laughter. The farce of "His First Gaiety Party" was, as the London bills would [illegible] a success, and the pattern of the trousers worn by Bicky Wort alone worth Mr Wright's journey to Somersetshire to see.

The performances were repeated at Bath on Tuesday, [illegible] full or house, and with increased effect. The theatre was [illegible] and the Marquis and Marchioness of Lonsdale, together with the élite of the society now [illegible] Journaling at Bath, [illegible]

LYCEUM.

At this theatre, the "King of the Peacocks" continues to attract, and on Thursday evening the house was crowded to witness the performances, preceded by a new farce, in one act, called "Save you Director." The plot of this piece, which is very slight, and scarcely sufficiently open on the stage for the purpose, turns upon adventures and embroilments that take place in the shop of an interesting young female barber, who is agreeably represented by Miss Fitzwilliam. The other acts, in the characters of Messrs. Harle, [illegible] and Mr Rexby, were extremely well performed, and some ludicrous situations towards the end brought the piece to a prosperous conclusion, and the curtain fell amidst great applause.

THE COLOSSEUM.—The Cyclorama of the great Earthquake at Lisbon, in 1755, continues to increase in popularity, as the scenic and mechanical effects of such a scene become better appreciated: it possesses, in addition to its splendid beauty of subject, to one of her most awful phenomena is engaged with great skill as a spectacle, it has never been surpassed. The Apollonian [illegible] ornament is, also, very impressive. Among the numerous visitors to the Cyclorama during the past week were the following distinguished persons: His Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein, Count and Countess of Hamilton and Lord and Countess of Harrington, Lord Garvagh, Lord Seagrave, Lord Kilmaine, Lord W. Lennox, Lady Lushington, Lady Harvey, Lady Whitmore, Lady Bateman, Lady May and party, Lady Erskine and party, Hon. Sir E. Cust, Sir W. and Lady Middleton, Sir T. E. Lennard and party, Sir E. N. Buxton, Hon. Mrs. Calvert, Colonel Gardiner, Captain Wemyss, &c.

MUSIC.

MADAME DULCKEN'S CONCERT.—The Hanover-square Rooms on Tuesday night were brilliantly attended for the concert of the highly-accomplished pianiste Madame Dulcken. She first performed in a duo concertante for pianoforte and violin (composed by Beethoven and Ries), assisted by Mr Sainton, on themes from Weber's operas. David is a great [illegible] of Madame Dulcken, and is the famed first violin of the Leipsic Subscription Concerts—Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D Minor afforded Madame Dulcken full scope to display her executive powers; and in a duet for two pianofortes (composed by Osborne), on themes from Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" Madame Dulcken and Mr Osborne achieved a decided success. Sainton played a clever violin fantasia, and Lindpainter's song, "The Standard Bearer," rendered so popular by Pischek. Belle conducted an orchestra selected from the players of the two Italian Opera-houses. The vocal part was sustained by Miss Jenny Lind, who sang three airs: the first "With verdure" [illegible] from Handel's "Creation;" the second, "Ach, ich fühl, from Mozart's "[illegible]" the English words; and Balfe's ballad, "The Lonely Rose." Miss Lind was each time encored in the two last-mentioned compositions. Misses Lucy and Mary Anne Long sang Holmes's duet, "The Swiss Maidens," and Mendelssohn's "The Vision." Signori Belletti and F. Lablache sang Italian duets from Donizetti's "Marino Faliero," and Rossini's "Il Turco in Italia." There was no vocal novelty in the programme, but it was judiciously selected, and afforded the highest gratification.

WALWORTH LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—The Musical Committee of the above institution are [illegible] to give a series of musical entertainments, at their new Lecture Hall, Lorrimore-square, Walworth. The dramatic oratorio of the "Creation" is selected to commence his series, and was performed on Monday [illegible] last, to a large and highly respectable audience. Miss E. Birch and Miss Cameron, with Messrs. Lefler and Cameron, neighbourhood, and were led by Mr. Peter. The audience [illegible] highly delighted with the performance, several of the solos being encored, and the general arrangements of the orchestra and the hall reflected the greatest credit [illegible] the committee of management. [illegible] Mr Nesbitt.

ROYAL ITALIAN [illegible]—Mr Balfe's new opera, "Il Talismano" (Auber's "Moulte de Portici" [illegible] in progress [illegible] and Mr [illegible] has arrived in town, and Mdlle. [illegible] Paulina Lorenz, and Massol will be here by the 1st of March; the engagement of the latter will be for [illegible] months; Miss Heywood, Mdlle Angri, and Mdlle. Marie are expected daily. The orchestra will consist of 16 first violins, 16 second ditto, 10 tenors, 10 violoncellos, 10 double basses, 2 harps, and 2 wind and piano instruments to each act of the opera.

MUSICAL EVENTS.—On Friday night was the first performance this season of Handel's oratorio "Israel in Egypt," conducted by Costa, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall: we shall notice this revival at our next publication.—Miss Fanny Wheadon gave a concert on Monday night at Crosby Hall—At the second meeting of the Melodists' Club, the artistes invited were, Signori Marras and Piatti, Messrs. W. S. Bennett and R. Blagrove.—Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be performed twice next week: on Thursday, for the second time, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and on Friday by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, conducted by Surman.—The 15th and last London Concert at Exeter Hall take place next Wednesday: another series of concerts will be then commenced.—Rumours [illegible] an English Opera at Drury Lane have been current lately in musical circles.—Mr. Laurent gave a morning concert next saturday, at Willis's Rooms. There is to be a cheap musical evening concert next [illegible] Hall, conducted by Benedict, at which our principal native singers will be engaged.—Amongst the arrivals for the season in London this year, Liszt is expected.—Molique, the composer and violinist, is about to settle in London.—Alard, the great violinist, is engaged for a concert in Manchester, will play in London this season.—Massol, the new tenor at the French Grand Opera in Paris, has made a great [illegible] with it is expected [illegible] he will [illegible] Duprez in his [illegible]—Meyerbeer's "Prophète" is now in rehearsal [illegible] Grisi, Viardot, Roger, and it is proclaimed will be produced on the 6th, or the 9th at latest, of April.

MUSIC IN PARIS.—Rossini's "Ganza Ladra" was given on Tuesday night at the Italian Opera, in Paris, Alboni appearing for the first time in Ninetta. The transposition of the music of this character to suit the register of Alboni's voice had the best effect on the music, and the part thus became quite to suit her style. Poppo was played by Mdlle. Merlo, the new contralto, with much graceful feeling: in the duo in the prison scene she was rapturously applauded. Morlacchi, the tenor, has arrived in Paris, and is to sing at the Italian Opera, in "Lucia." The engagement of Mdlle. Ugalde, of the Opéra Comique, for Her Majesty's Theatre is rumoured, as also of Madame Bosio. A new opera has been [illegible] produced at St. Petersburg with the [illegible] the music by a Russian nobleman, and the libretto an Italian translation of the [illegible] drama "Le Comte de Paris." The Gamin Bouffé [illegible] has admirably played and sung in Scribe's Amy.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Handel's "Israel in [illegible] was performed at Exeter-hall, for the second time [illegible] M. Costa on Thursday last.

PARIS NATIONAL GUARDS' VISIT TO LONDON.—M Dantan aîné has executed an interesting medallic commemoration of the visit of the National Guards to the Mansion-house, and their friendly reception by the late Lord Mayor (Alderman Hooper). The design shows his Lordship fraternising with Le Comte of the Guard and in the composition are twenty figures of the Lady Mayoress, the Garde Nationale à cheval (Brigadier), the Duke of Beauregard, the superior of the monastery, was installed in that office, and was presented with a crosier, ring, mitre, and gloves, each of which was separately blessed by Le Right Rev. Dr. Ullathorne, Roman Catholic Bishop of the Midland District. This being the first occasion of the kind in England since the Reformation, and some interest was excited in the neighbourhood, and a few Roman Catholic gentlemen, from considerable distances, were present to witness the ceremony. Bishop Waring was amongst the visitors, but took no part in the proceedings. Several other Roman Catholic clergymen were present, amongst whom was Abbot Brame, from Mount Melleray Abbey of La Trappe, Waterford; and Abbots Augustin, of Bellefontaine, and Maxime, of La Trappe.

LITERATURE.

FOUR MONTHS AMONG THE GOLD-FINDERS OF ALTA-CALIFORNIA—By J. TYRWHITT BROOKS M.D. Boone

This volume is the first methodical account of the recent finding of the Deposit in Upper California which has excited such interest in England. All the information reached us mostly through the American newspapers, no very recommendatory channel for intelligence which, in its bare facts, is astounding. The stories of heaps of gold here crushed by the sole energy of unarmed men, not one needed not to be told with the gusto of exaggeration to shake the faith of matter-of-fact reading readers of newspapers. In New York, several pamphlets have appeared upon the subject, some of them, by the way, in vers printed in gold; still, these publications are crude yet together, and clumsily made up from the public journals. Then, one of the latest travellers, Mr. Bryant, in his "What I saw in California," did not go far [illegible] of the gold, seeing that he travelled some two years before it was discovered. The book before us will, therefore, be very acceptable for its detail of what will hereafter be regarded as one of the most extraordinary events in the history of "the precious metals."

Dr. Brooks's narrative consists of the diary of his expedition from San Francisco to the Gold District. He has no pretensions to authorship, but has the better-skilled character of being with it on the journey. The author, in a letter to his brother, in England, dated Monterey, October 11th, 1848, tells us that he and a few more agriculturists, suffering by the failure of the emigration schemes to Oregon, left that barren, desert-like place, to shift their quarters to California, the soil of which country was represented to be of surpassing fertility. There

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Monday forenoon the Queen rode on horseback in the riding school attached to Buckingham Palace. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge visited her Majesty at Buckingham Palace. The Royal children walked and rode out during the day. In the evening the Queen and Prince honoured the performance of the French plays with their presence. The Royal suite consisted of the Countess of Charlemont, Hon. Miss Macdonald, the Earl of Listowel, Sir Edward Bowater, and Colonel Seymour.

On Tuesday the Queen and Prince Albert attended by the Countess of Charlemont, Sir Edward Bowater, and Colonel [illegible], went to Claremont and paid a visit to the ex-Royal family of France. The Royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace included his Serene Highness the Prince Lowenstein, his Excellency Viscount de Menneval and the Viscountess de Menneval, the Marchioness of Waterford, the Earl and Countess of Minto, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, the Right Hon. Sir Francis and Lady Arabella Baring, and the Right Hon. Thomas Wyse.

On Wednesday their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Parma visited the Queen and Prince Albert, at Buckingham Palace. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, and the Princess Helena, took their accustomed exercise daily during the week.

On Monday a deputation from the Provident Institution, St. Martin's place, had an audience of Prince Albert, at Buckingham Palace, to solicit the honour of his Royal Highness becoming Patron of the institution. The Prince was graciously pleased to accept the office of President

Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Seymour, Equerry in Waiting, visited Mr. Cubitt's factory at Thames Bank, on Monday.

It is understood that Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian Minister in this country, has returned to his post invested with full powers, not only from the Court of Berlin but from the Germanic Government at Frankfort, to enter upon a negotiation for the conclusion of a definitive treaty of peace between Denmark and those States of Germany which thought fit to interfere by arms in the dispute relative to the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

NATAL LAND AND EMIGRATION SOCIETY.—On Wednesday evening a meeting of this Society was held at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, for the purpose of extending a knowledge of the great capabilities of Natal as a field for British emigration, and to consider the best means of enabling intending emigrants of limited resources to take advantage of concessions Government are willing to make to promote the settlement of that colony, George Dundas, Esq., M.P., in the chair, who opened the business of the evening by hearing testimony to the excellent character of the climate and soil of Natal, and expressing an opinion that co-operation alone would enable mechanics, small tradesmen, and small farmers, to obtain that land bounty, equivalent to cost of passage out, which formerly had been a reserved privilege for large capitalists and rich land companies. Now they had the opportunity of forming an association which would, by arrangements made with Government, receive 5000 acres of land in Natal for every £1000 expended in carrying themselves to the country of their adoption. Several resolutions were submitted to this effect, and discussion elicited much favourable information connected with Natal. A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the proceedings.

THE ROBBERY AT ST. PANCRAS WORKHOUSE.—At a recent meeting of the directors of the poor, the following resolution and amendment were passed:—Resolution: "That in consequence of Mr. M'Gahey's continued inattention to the duties of his situation, his repeated neglect to pay bankers' cheques into the banker's hands as soon as he receives them, and particularly his great carelessness in not taking proper care of the keys of the strong room, when moneys were placed there by him, or by his direction, this board do recommend to the vestry his dismissal."—Amendment: "That the vestry clerk be suspended from his office for one week. That he be required to make up and pay the balance of his accounts on this day six weeks. That he be required to be punctual in his attendance, and attentive to his duties, and on the least failure or omission in the performance of his duties, or in the neglect or omission to pay the balance due on the day above mentioned, this board will, without further notice, recommend to the vestry that he be forthwith dismissed." At a meeting subsequently of the vestry it was resolved: "That this vestry highly approve of the proceedings of the Board of Directors relative to the burglary that took place on Thursday evening or Friday morning last, in the vestry rooms of this parish, and tender the board their thanks for their promptness in the matter."—Mr. M'Gahey was called before the vestry, and in answer to a question by the chairman, said he had communicated to the Guarantee Society, which society are his sureties, the circumstances of the occurrence, and his own unfortunate position, but that he had not a copy of the letter he had sent. The chairman said that during the suspension of the vestry-clerk, a finance committee had been appointed to receive and pay all moneys, and that he held the keys of the strong room, and the papers where the records, &c. were kept. An exceedingly painful discussion ensued as to what course should be adopted with regard to communicating with the Guarantee Society, and after having ultimately been resolved to forward to that body a copy of the resolution come to by the Board of Directors, the proceedings terminated. No clue has as yet been found to trace the thief, for whose discovery a reward of £50 has been offered.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE CITY.—On Wednesday workmen commenced removing the buildings standing between Budge-row and the old church yard of St. Zachary, for the purpose of forming the new line of street from Walbrook to St. Paul's. The whole of the houses between Turnwheel-lane and Dowgate-hill have been completely razed.

REFORMATION OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.—The Goldsmiths' Company have presented the munificent donation of £200 to the Ragged School and Philanthropic Society are now establishing at Redhill, near Reigate, Surrey, for the reformation and industrial training of criminal and vagrant boys. His Royal Highness Prince Albert has fixed Monday, April 2, for laying the foundation stone of chapel, school, and other buildings of the society's new establishment.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS, &c.—By the return of the registrar-general for the week ending February 17, it appears that the numbers were—births, 1497; deaths, 1225. The present return is of an unfavourable character. It shows that 1225 deaths were registered in the week, while the average is 1160. The increase is still the effect of influenza, to which 333 deaths are ascribed, or 112 more than have occurred on the average at this season. Amongst these, scarlatina and hooping cough (which have doubled the weekly mortality from these causes of previous years), diarrhœa and cholera are observed to predominate. The mortality from cholera and typhus was last week the same, namely, 49 deaths—the latter disease having exhibited a considerable decrease from the 69 deaths—the latter disease having exhibited a considerable decrease from the 69 deaths—the latter disease having exhibited a considerable decrease from the 69

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

LORD DUDLEY STUART.

THERE are few members of the House of Commons, unconnected with the Ministry, or not numbered amongst either the leaders of "her Majesty's Opposition" or those of the sections of the independent members who occupy the benches at both sides of the House below the gangway, whose name has become more familiar to the public ear than that of Lord Dudley Stuart—as the friend of the Polish refugees. The noble Lord's benevolent and long-sustained exertions in behalf of those unfortunate victims of Russian despotism that found their way into this country after the final dispersion of the gallant army whose heroic deeds against the barbarous hordes of the Czar in the insurrection of Poland, some few years back, were the admiration of Europe at the time, while they have tended in some degree to mitigate the anguish of failure in such a cause, to which those devoted men must have been a prey, by rescuing them from the fear of want, have also had, with respect to the noble Lord himself, the satisfactory effect of placing and keeping him before the public eye in a position highly honourable, and calculated to win the popular favour.

LORD DUDLEY COUTTS STUART, M.P. FOR MARYLEBONE.

His Lordship has not had an uninterrupted tenure of a seat in Parliament since he first entered public life, having been no less than ten years out of the House. He sat for the borough of Arundel from the year 1830 to 1837, when he failed in securing the majority of the votes in the borough at the elections in that year, and he was not again returned to represent any constituency in the Legislature from that time until the general elections in the autumn of 1847, when, having presented himself, among other candidates, to the notice of the electors of the metropolitan borough of Marylebone, to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Sir Charles Napier, he at first obtained but very modified support amongst that political body, the majority of whom regarded him as too aristocratic to suit them; but their favourite candidate, Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, the Commissioner of the City of London Police, having, at the last moment, and quite unexpectedly, withdrawn from the contest on the plea that he could not afford to throw up his Commissionership, as he should be obliged to do in the event of his election, the great body of the voters, to prevent their chagrin at this disappointment being aggravated by the return of the Conservative candidate, in the absence of a man more to their liking than Lord Dudley, united with his Lordship's supporters, and he was returned, by a large majority, M.P. for Marylebone, in conjunction with Sir Benjamin Hall.

Lord Dudley Stuart is a liberal in politics. On the hustings, in Marylebone, he professed himself in favour of "progressive reform," "an opponent of every system of centralization, and an upholder of local rights; the enemy of all religious endowments, and of the maintenance of any religious disabilities;" and, accordingly, we find him voting in the majority on Monday night in favour of Lord John Russell's motion for a committee to revise and alter the oaths taken by members of Parliament, with a view to their being so shaped as to admit of Jews taking their seat amongst the representatives of the people.

Lord Dudley Stuart does not often take a prominent part in the debates of the House; when he does, his style of speaking and his matter do not rise above common-place. Towards the close of last session, when, in committee of supply, the yearly vote in aid of the Polish exiles in this country was attacked by the economists, the defence of his hobby brought him to his legs, and he succeeded less by the force of his language or of his reasoning, than by the respect entertained by his opponents for the well-intentioned motives of his advocacy, in staving off, for that time at least, the threatened storm. In the present session he has also addressed the House on a question of a grant of the public money, but on this occasion he has not come forward as the advocate of unrestricted benevolence, perhaps because the objects of the national bounty are his fellow-subjects.

In the debate on Friday, the 16th inst., on the proposed Government grant of £50,000 in aid of the poor-rates in some of the most destitute districts in the south and west of Ireland, his Lordship moved as an amendment, "That the money be advanced by way of loan, to be repaid by means of a rate levied on the whole of the unions, except those receiving such relief." The noble Lord on that occasion, with inconsistent forgetfulness of his Polish benevolence, said, "That he had experienced some difficulty in making up his mind to vote for the grant, but economical principles must yield to the pressing necessity which existed for saving the lives of the people. There could be no doubt Ireland at large was able to repay this vote. Only a few days ago a letter had been addressed to the Irish people by John, Archbishop of Tuam, calling on them, in the midst of their distress, to subscribe for the relief of the Pope in his pecuniary difficulties. He thought, then, that the House ought to require that this money should be repaid, or there was a chance of some of it finding its way to Rome. His proposal also ought to have the support of those honourable members who were opposed to the vote, as well as of many who were in favour of it; and he thought the Government ought to agree to it, judging from the speech of the noble Lord the other night, in which he said he had in contemplation some measure or other by which Ireland at large should provide for local distress."

Lord Dudley's outburst of new-born economy was responded to by the Earl of ARUNDEL and SURREY, who in a happy strain reminded "his noble friend that the Pope sent money to Ireland to relieve her distress (hear, hear); and, without in the least detracting from the high character of his noble friend, he would observe that the same complaint had been urged against him with respect to Poland. ("Hear" and a laugh.) It had been customary for the Church, from the earliest ages, to contribute towards the distress of other parts of the world." The amendment was ultimately negatived by a majority of 157 to 9, and the proposition of the Government, that the sum should be a grant à la Polonaise, was agreed to.

Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart is son of the first Marquis of Bute by his second wife, daughter of the late Thomas Coutts, Esq., and was born in the year 1803. He married, in 1824, Christina Alexandrine Egypta, daughter of Lucien Bonaparte, and sister of the present Prince of Canino. She died in 1847. The noble Lord was educated in Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A., in 1823. He is a Deputy-Lieutenant of Bucks.

BALLYMODAN CHURCH, IN COURSE OF ERECTION AT BANDON.

BALLYMODAN CHURCH.

THIS Church is now in course of erection, at Bandon, in the county of Cork; and a highly influential meeting of the Protestants of the parish was lately held for the purpose of making arrangements for the completion of the new Church, and to receive the report of the Building Committee for the past year. The Countess of Bandon, Lady Harriet and the Hon. Mrs. Bernard, of Castle Bernard, honoured the meeting with their presence. From the unavoidable absence of the Earl of Bandon, on the motion of the Rev. John Bleakley, Lord Viscount Bernard took the chair, the Hon. H. B. Bernard and R. W. Doherty, Esq., acting as secretaries.

The Rev. Mr. Bleakley opened the proceedings by stating the position of the committee. It appears that before the rebuilding of the Church could be commenced, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners required the sum of £2000 to be lodged by the parishioners; and, as they were unable to raise so large a sum at the time, their valued and respected treasurer, Honourable H. B. Bernard, kindly advanced the amount required. In addition to this, they had been obliged to expend a large sum in enclosing the additional burying-ground, so that from the commencement they found themselves encumbered with a debt considerably above £400. Two years of fearful difficulty and distress succeeded, so that at times their situation seemed to be almost hopeless; but they were thankful to be able to say they met on that occasion almost without debt; for, of the large amount to which they had referred, there remained unpaid the trifling sum of £17, due to the treasurer, and one or two other small debts, amounting altogether to about £6. And surely, when they considered what had thus been accomplished during two years of unparalelled difficulty and distress, they had abundant reason to "thank God, and take courage." The progress of the work, too, had been most satisfactory. The building had been visited by the Lord Bishop of the diocese and the Archdeacon of Cork, both of whom expressed themselves much pleased and gratified with the manner in which the work had been executed. They now required a sum of about £600 to complete what had been so nobly begun. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners (after a very lengthened correspondence) had consented to give £200 towards this most desirable object; and Mr. Bleakley had no doubt that a very little effort on the part of the friends of the Church would succeed in accomplishing what they all had so much at heart, the erection of a house dedicated to the service and worship of the one living and true God. True, their lot had been cast in troublesome times—true, there was a pressure abroad affecting all classes of society—but he believed there was spirit enough in the men of Bandon to complete what they had begun; and there was attachment enough to the religion of the Bible to induce them to come forward, and, if necessary, practise self-denial in order to aid in the great and glorious cause.

The noble chairman then addressed the meeting, and stated that Lord Bandon, in addition to a large contribution, had that day sent £100 to the treasurer, as his second donation towards the completion of the tower. His Lordship then glanced at the prospects of Protestantism in Ireland, and expressed a fervent hope that the meeting would come forward liberally to carry out so deeply important an object as the completion of so noble an edifice, on the site of a church sacred to them by the remembrance of so many early associations—sacred as the last resting-place of those they "had known, and loved, and lost"—an edifice creditable to the town of Bandon, and within whose walls would be proclaimed the doctrine of a standing or a falling Church—justification by faith in the alone merits of a Crucified Redeemer. He trusted the meeting would not content themselves by exertions in their own town, but would also aid by their countenance and assistance those who peculiarly required help in other localities. He alluded to the many parishes in the diocese in want of churches and residences for their clergy. The Commissioners of the Ecclesiastical Board could not, it was said, assist. Some plan might be devised by which the present wants might be in some measure supplied, and the inhabitants of other parishes be excited to follow the example of Bandon.

Captain the Hon. William S. Bernard then proposed thanks to "the Ballymodan Church Building Committee," which was seconded by Mr. Bennett.

The Rev. A. Sealy proposed the next resolution, and urged the necessity of completing the church sufficiently for divine service without delay.

Mr. Jas. Moriarty, in seconding the resolution, observed:—"When, upwards of two centuries ago, the original church was founded by your ancestors, a little band of united Protestants weekly assembled within its walls, zealous and devoted worshipers, and left to their descendants an example that they should follow their steps, and worship the God of their fathers, earnestly contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. Our increasing population now requires a larger building, and for us was reserved the high privilege of testifying our zeal and Christian love, by providing ample accommodation for those increasing wants in the erection of a structure worthy of the town. Yes, my Lord, and as Bandon has ever been distinguished for its high political Protestantism, I feel assured it will be found faithful in true Church of England Protestantism by bringing to completion this sanctuary, where all may assemble and worship God according to His Word."

Arrangements were then made for raising the necessary funds for the completion of the Church, and a considerable sum subscribed by the meeting. A vote of thanks was passed to the noble chairman; and the meeting then separated, deeply gratified with the statements laid before them, and fully resolved to leave no effort untried to complete their Church, and trusting to the aid of friends of real religion in other parts of the empire.

SAFFRON-WALDEN CORN EXCHANGE.

THE pleasing little Corn Exchange, of which the annexed is a representation, has just been erected in the thriving market-town of Saffron-Walden, in Essex. The edifice is Italian in character; and the front, as may be seen from our Illustration, consists of a centre, which projects boldly forward from the two wings. The central portion contains the entrance doorway, flanked by coupled columns, carrying a broken architrave; and it is surmounted by a lofty tower, which is divided into three storeys, the lower having trusses at the angles, and triple windows on each side; the second storey, also having trusses at the corners, has a dial, beneath which is sculptured scroll-work, on each face; and the third storey is formed by a circular dome-crowned turret, enriched with festoons of flowers in relief, and surmounted by a vane. The wings of the building have pilasters and architrave mouldings wrought on them, and niches with pedimented heads. The side of the building has a corresponding character with the wings, and, like them, is crowned with a balustrade.

The architect is Mr. Richard Tress, of London; and the builder, Mr. Erswell, of Saffron-Walden.

Adjoining the Corn-Exchange a Savings'-Bank and Post-Office are being erected—an extremely elegant and well-proportioned pile of building of Italian character. It is slightly shown in perspective in our view.

In clearing the site for this new Exchange, amongst some old houses pulled down was a fine old hall, from the style of architecture, erected in the time of Henry VII., doubtless a relic of the domestic habitation of one of the wealthy traders of olden time. The carved heads from the hammer beams of the roof of this hall are now in the possession of the Hon. R. C. Neville, at Audley End.

SAINT DAVID'S DAY.—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

SAINT DAVID'S DAY.

THE VISION OF ST. KENTIGERN.

(See the Illustration at page [illegible].)

St. David, or Dewid, was one of Arthur's principal generals, and lived in King Arthur's time, the sixth century. Wales, however, at all events, has always been, because of its poverty, represented to have seen but little of its sovereign.

In the deep midnight, waking, in my cell,
Methought there came the vision which I tell.
I had long fasted and had prayed to-day,
I never gats me down as I had put me bed on,
Kneel so that I have a stranger to me eyes,
And tears to mantle me with meekness.
Before that hour I often saw or prayed,
And I was down on my knees [illegible] my soul.
Dark was my cell—its roof was massive stone—
But through the vault—upon its western note—
For, often, and while I, as above, was away,
And wailed, and hymned, and did the day
Long, [illegible] I was [illegible]
I saw a rare beauty that [illegible]
All upon me [illegible] and I stood as stand
Of heavenly trees standing all around.
Then, as my thoughts the bright heaven more air,
Moving my lips [illegible] prayer,
I saw, and [illegible] wings,
Seven harpers tuning upon golden strings—
Their garments and their hair as white as snow,
To their own music waving to and fro,
And high amid them, on whose earnest face
Celestial sweets and heavenly grace
Stood in the cloud, and held upon a sword
I know St. David! how, sat Kentigern.
Such as in mortal he had been, I smiled,
He seemed to me. I advanced, drawn glad and
In the three lads, not knowing aught but Grasped the good war-sword he had not we laid.
But not for battle—all unarmed were our—
The cloud-seat shining as he drew [illegible] near.
And I was all in fearlessness, and met me
Shone with the light of Immortality.
I gazed with wonder and with years dread
Till the bright vision pass, and vanished,
And were I now that all his sins forgiven,
I saw St. David in nothing up to heaven.
And for long minutes after all was fair
I heard the whispering voices of cherubim,
And the celestial music their air [illegible]
Of the seven harpers harping in the cloud.
And ever now I hear the music ring,
And sweet how voices kindly murmuring—
"This, who hath seen a vision to-day thus,
Be strong in faith and in all [illegible]
Strive by good works and charity, and prayer,
The point to win the [illegible] to wear."
Such sweet voice, through my heart and brain!
I will obey you. Hark! they sound again! M.

GIRAFFE AND HER YOUNG, AT THE MENAGERIE OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY, REGENT'S-PARK.

YOUNG GIRAFFE

IN THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S MENAGERIE IN THE REGENT'S PARK.

THE female Giraffe, which was imported by the Zoological Society in 1836, produced her fifth male fawn on Monday, February 12; and we are desirous of commemorating so singular an event by an Illustration, for which we are indebted to the pencil of Mr. G. Landseer.

The extraordinary success which has attended the experiment of acclimatising so entirely tropical an animal by the Society, affords the best proof of the capabilities of this valuable and interesting Institution; and our readers will watch with attention the continued efforts of the managers to extend our knowledge of the structure and habits of all the great types of the animal kingdom, which their unequalled resources will enable them successively to present to the public of this country.

The mother of this last addition to the collection was captured in Dongolah, in April, 1835, by M. Thibaud, who had proceeded to Kordofan in the previous year, by agreement with the Society, for the express purpose of obtaining animals of this species, of which, at that time, only two living individuals had reached Europe.

She was successfully transported with three males by M. Thibaud and the Arabs in his employment, from Wadi Alfa to Cairo, Alexandria, and Malta, in which latter place they passed the winter of 1835–36.

In the May following, she arrived at the Gardens, where the spacious building and enclosure, to which their successful treatment is mainly to be attributed, was expressly constructed for this valuable group, whose appearance soon attracted crowds of visitors from all parts of the country.

The birth of the first fawn took place in 1839; the second occurred in 1841; and this fine animal is, we doubt not, now well known to most of our Irish readers as an inhabitant of the Zoological Gardens in Dublin, to which he was presented in a spirit of true liberality, by the Council of our London Society, in 1844.

The third and fourth fawns, now 5 and 3 years old respectively, and both males, are still in the Society's possession; and, like their elder brother, bid fair to equal their parents in magnificence of stature. We are informed that the subject of our Illustration is still larger than either of the fawns which preceded him. It gives us great pleasure to remark, that the mother, after an existence of nearly 13 years in this country, exhibits no indication of decaying vigour, and is in as fine condition as we ever remember to have seen her.

We did not fail to notice a very marked improvement which has taken place in another department of the Society's collection. We allude to the method now adopted in displaying some reptiles which have been added since our notice of the rattlesnake, in our Journal of Jan. 27; and we rejoice to hear that it is intended to extend the opportunities of studying this interesting, but hitherto almost neglected, class of animals, on a scale commensurate with the other operations of the Institution.

BRIBERY AT ELECTION.—A bill for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at elections has been prepared and brought in by Sir J. Pakington, Lord Ashley, Mr. Bouverie, and Mr. Brotherton. The following are its main provisions:—Every member of Parliament, before taking his seat, to make and subscribe a declaration against bribery. Persons convicted of bribery after such declaration incapacitated to sit in Parliament. Agreements for payment of a stipulated sum to procure a seat in Parliament to be illegal, and within the laws against bribery. Candidates may be called on at the time of election to make declaration against bribery. Persons declared by election committees to be guilty of personally giving or receiving bribes to forfeit their right of voting.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

NAVY ESTIMATES.—The navy estimates for the year 1849-50 have, in compliance with an order by the House of Commons, been printed and laid before the members. From these estimates it appears that the cost of the naval department of the public service for the year 1849-50 will be £6,360,740, while for the year 1848-49 it was £7,818,510. The reduction, therefore, which will be effected this year over the naval estimates of last will be no less than £1,257,870.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.—The army estimates for 1849-50 have also been published; and although they do not show a reduction in the amount to be provided for the effective and non-effective services of the army for the year ending on the 31st of March, 1850, corresponding with that of the navy, they exhibit a decrease from the votes of the current year of £378,634, and £535,000 less than the vote for the year ending March 31, 1847, the estimated vote for the ensuing financial year being £6,142,311.

PENINSULAR MEDALS.—Lord Grey intimated a fortnight ago that these long-delayed medals were ready for distribution; but it appears that not more than three thousand out of about twenty thousand are issuable. Those claimed by general officers have mostly been delivered, and those to which officers on full or half-pay are entitled are now in course of delivery; but the much larger proportion claimed by non-commissioned officers and privates are not likely to be all issued for three or four months, unless, indeed, the Duke of Richmond or some other titled personage should expedite the deliveries by repeated reminders to the authorities.

REDUCTION IN THE ADMIRALTY.—It is rumoured in official circles that the Board of Admiralty will be reduced by one commissioner. Their Lordships are expected to commence their annual official perambulation of the seaports and dockyards next month.

REDUCTIONS IN THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.—The Board of Ordnance have resolved to effect a very considerable reduction in the various departments under their control. The clerks at the Tower and Pall-mall are to be reduced to a considerable extent. In one department alone, that of the clerk of the Ordnance, twelve clerks are to be reduced, and in all nearly fifty clerks are to leave the two departments. The senior clerks are to be superannuated, and their vacancies filled up out of the junior classes, but the places held by the latter are not to be filled up. The Board of Ordnance also intend visiting the Royal Arsenal immediately, with the view of ascertaining what reductions can be made in the various departments. It is expected that several clerks in the storekeepers' departments will be superannuated, the number at present being twelve permanent and two temporary clerks, whilst during the war the established number was only four. Captain Evan Mainerly, who was appointed additional officer at the Royal carriage department at a salary of 5s. per diem, has received notice that his salary will be discontinued in the ensuing financial year, but he is to be allowed to retain the situation, which will exempt him from being sent on foreign service.

REMOVAL OF TROOPS.—An arrangement of some importance has just been decided upon by the Government and military authorities, which will effect a considerable saving in the army expenditure this year compared with that of last year. It is, that the military authorities have directed, in accordance with the request of the Government, that the usual annual change of the stations of cavalry regiments early in the summer is not this year to take place; and, further, that no infantry regiment is to be removed from its present quarters unless at the express request of the civil authorities in any case of apprehended disturbance or riot. This arrangement, as respects infantry regiments particularly, whilst it will cause a saving to the country, will also prevent the annoyance and inconvenience to which both officers and men lately returned from foreign service were last year subjected, by removal, after a few months, from one station to another. The usual change of quarters of the brigade of Guards will, however, take place on the 1st proximo.

NAVAL RECEIPT AND EXPENDITURE.—The account of the naval receipt and expenditure for the year ending the 31st of March, 1848, has just been published, with the report of the commissioners of audit thereon. The amount granted for naval services for the year 1847-8, per Act 10th and 11th Victoria, cap. 107, was £7,861,876. Besides this grant, a sum of £345,419 19s. 7d. was voted by Parliament in the following proportions:—Wages to seamen and marines, £28,444; victuals for ditto, £50,853; General Register and Record Office of Seamen, £34; scientific branch, £2320. Her Majesty's establishments at home, £1892; naval stores, &c., £47,659; medicines and medical stores, £2151; miscellaneous services, £4700; military pensions, &c., £5000; civil pensions, £2673; army and ordnance departments, £14,488; home department, £13,048; Post-office department, £1350. The following are the principal items of expenditure:—Wages to seamen and marines, £1,676,346; victuals for ditto, £737,766; Admiralty Office, £148,218; General Register and Record Office of Seamen, £8694; scientific branch, £35,345. The Queen's establishments at home, £139,829. The Queen's establishments abroad, £26,330; wages to artificers, &c., employed in her Majesty's establishment at home, £883,620; ditto in the Queen's establishments abroad, £42,858; naval stores, &c., for the building and repair of ships, docks, &c., £1,474,890; new works, improvements, and repairs in the yards, £596,580; medicine and medical stores, £30,421; miscellaneous services, £77,935; half-pay to officers of the navy and royal marines, £737,686; military pensions and allowances, £487,207; civil pensions and allowances, £148,450; army and ordnance departments (conveyance of troops), £343,758; home department (convict service), £48,469; Post Office department (contract packet service), £366,165. Total, £8,060,985.

RUINS OF THE PALACE, OTFORD, KENT.

THE portion of gateway and outbuildings represented in our Illustration is all that remains of the once noble Archiepiscopal Palace of the See of Canterbury. Within its walls many of the most celebrated of the Archbishops of Canterbury have resided, and vast sums of money were spent in making it a goodly fabric; and it is related that Warham, who was made Archbishop in 1502, expended £30,000 in adorning and enlarging the building. Cranmer, Warham's successor in the see of Canterbury, surrendered Otford to Henry VIII., as he did also the neighbouring manor of the Knole and its appurtenances, which had been bequeathed to the see of Canterbury by Archbishop Bourchier.

The Knole has since been in the possession of different noble families, and the glorious mansion, the chief part of which was erected in the time of Elizabeth and James I., is still intact; but of Otford little more than a gateway, as before observed, remains to attest the site. The style of this gateway shows it to have been erected about the latter part of the reign of Henry VII.; it may be earlier, but, perhaps, is the work of Bourchier or his successor Dene, who mostly resided at Otford during his brief possession of the mitre.

There is a beautiful spring of water near this gateway.

Otford, it may be necessary to mention, is not far from Sevenoaks, on the road to Dartford.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.

Henry Halford Vaughan, Esq., has taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy as her Majesty's Professor of Modern History, in the room of the late Very Rev. the Dean of Carlisle.

The Church Missionary Society held its annual meeting at the Town-Hall, Oxford, on the evening of Monday last. The Lord Bishop of the diocese presided; and on the platform, among a large number of clergy and gentry, were the Lord Bishop of Madras, and the Bishop designate of Victoria. Sermons in aid of the society were preached at several churches of the city, and £140 was collected. The collection at the Town-Hall amounted to £36 6s.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.—An election to five scholarships now vacant will take place on the 20th of March. Two are open, without any limitation as to place of birth; one, on Sir Simon Bennet's foundation, is open to persons born within the province of Canterbury; and two, on the foundation of Mr. Priestone and Mr. Hunt, are for natives of the county of York. The examination will commence on the 16th; and candidates are required to present in person to the master, certificates of their baptism and place of birth, together with the usual testimonials of good conduct from their respective colleges and schools, on or before March 1.

CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE.—An election will be held in this college, on the 23rd of March, of three scholars of the counties of Surrey, Hants, and Bedford, respectively.

CAMBRIDGE.

The Vice-Chancellor has given notice that the election for the Bell Scholarships will take place on Friday, the 23rd of March next.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.—The copy of a proposed grace, having for its object the appointment of a syndicate to revise the statutes, was made public a short time since. It appears that the names mentioned did not give universal satisfaction, and a meeting on the subject was held in the rooms of the Architectural Society. There were about forty gentlemen present, and a deputation was appointed to call upon the Vice-Chancellor, and request the withdrawal of the grace, on the ground that due consideration had not been given before the names were inserted. The deputation accordingly waited upon the Vice-Chancellor, who complied with the request, and the grace was not offered at the congregation.

BRISTOL CATHEDRAL.—The Dean and the majority of the Chapter of this Cathedral are still at variance on the subject of intoning part of the service. Two contradictory orders have been issued, that of the Chapter directs the intonation of the service as formerly. The Dean, on the contrary, orders it to be read and not intoned. It is much to be regretted that this unseemly difference is not stopped by authority.

BISHOP OF EXETER AND MR. GORHAM.—Sir Herbert Jenner Fust has so far given his judgment in this case, that the Bishop is not limited in his examination of a new incumbent to the twenty-eight days mentioned in the canon, and that, therefore, the objection raised by Mr. Gorham is untenable. The question of unsoundness of doctrine yet remains to be discussed.

PRESENTATION TO A CLERGYMAN.—A handsome set of church service books, beautifully bound in purple morocco, consisting of a bible, prayer book, and two communion books, have been presented by 133 parishioners, to the Rev. J. M. St. Clere Raymond, M.A., vicar of Dinnington, Northumberland, for use of that church.

EPISCOPAL RESIDENCES.—The Ecclesiastical Commission has authorised the expenditure of the following sums on episcopal residences:—Palace at Ripon, £14,689; purchase of land and house for the Bishop of Gloucester, £11,000; alteration of house for him, £11,697; purchase of estate and house for the Bishop of Lincoln, £3500; alteration of house for him, £13,392; purchase of house and estate for the Bishop of Rochester, £25,567; alteration of the residence of the Bishop of Worcester, £7000; alteration of the residence of the Bishop of Oxford, £5493.

THE IRISH ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.—The annual report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland, for the year ending the 1st of August, 1848, has been printed by order of the House of Commons. The total receipts of the commissioners amounted to £38,787 7s. 7d., and the disbursements to £37,000, leaving a balance of £11,787 7s. 7d., to be carried to the current account. The commissioners report that several churches are in course of erection, and others under repair, but express their regret that their funds are inadequate to meet the demands constantly made for assistance.

FINANCIAL REFORM.—MR. COBDEN'S MOTION.

MR. COBDEN'S motion for a reduction of the national expenditure did not excite as much interest in the House of Commons as might have been expected from the importance of the subject, the celebrity of its introducer, the preliminary tracts of the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, and the agitation in connexion with it, that has taken place throughout the country. The terms of the resolution were, in some degree, the cause of this result. In selecting the estimates of 1835 as those which were amply sufficient to provide for all the real necessities of the country at the present day, Mr. Cobden did not attempt to pledge the House to return immediately to that standard. He pointedly guarded himself against being so misunderstood. The words of the resolution stated the amount of taxation in 1835 to be ten millions less than it is in 1849, and merely affirmed the expediency of reducing the annual expenditure with all possible speed, to an amount which, within the last fourteen years, has been found sufficient for the maintenance of the honour, dignity, and security of the nation. The resolution was thus of a nature too vague to cause much embarrassment to the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had only to declare, as he did, that he was friendly to all prudent and safe economy, and as anxious as Mr. Cobden himself to reduce the burden of taxation that pressed upon the people of this country; and the sting was taken out of Mr. Cobden's motion. The main argument of Mr. Cobden for the reduction was ably, temperately, and eloquently stated; but it failed to bring any conviction to the minds of his hearers that reduction was immediately practicable. It is true, as he stated, that when there was alarm of invasion on the part of Russia, in 1836, we added 5000 men to our naval force; that when rebellion occurred in Canada, in 1838, we added 8000 soldiers to our army; that when the rebellion of Frost, Williams, and Jones took place in Wales, in 1839, we augmented our military force by another 5000 men; that in 1840-41, when we were embroiled with Syria, and threatened with a rupture with France, we again made an addition of the same number of men to our army; that the dispute with the Government of the United States relative to the boundary of the State of Maine caused an addition of 4000 men to our naval forces; that the Oregon business led to the increase of our expenditure upon the military, naval, and ordnance departments of £1,600,000; and that each and all of these augmentations have been continued until the present time, although the dangers and difficulties which they were severally levied to combat or to guard against have passed away. These were all strong points, and they were strongly argued. Mr. Cobden ran over them with much felicity of diction and illustration, and made it clear that it was not necessary for any one of these reasons to maintain, at the present day, our establishments, either naval or military, upon a more expensive footing than that on which they were placed in 1835. But Mr. Cobden proved no more than this; and, unfortunately for the argument of those who insist upon the expediency and necessity of immediate and extensive reduction, it is necessary to prove a great deal more. It must be made evident not only that all these dangers have passed away, but that no other dangers of equal magnitude exist, to call for the exercise of our foresight, and the display of such resources as will prove to Europe and the world that Great Britain is ready for all contingencies. It was on this point that Mr. Cobden failed to convince Parliament. It is on this point, also, that his argument will be weakest in the estimation of the country. It is in vain to shut our eyes to, or deny the fact that the affairs of Europe are in a very unsettled state; and that, either with or without our consent, or by the operation of an irresistable and uncontrollable necessity, we may be implicated in them, and be compelled to display physical force to hold our own against the world. We may attempt to gloss over the disagreeable apprehension, by panegyrics upon the desirableness of peace; and by proof upon proof of a fact not to be denied, that the true interest and wisest policy of all nations are to mind their own affairs without embroiling themselves with those of their neighbours. All sensible men agree in the truth of such opinions; yet the impression remains, and will not be got rid of, that there is danger, in the present state of Europe, for any nation holding first or second rank to be quite unprepared for war. The world of civilization is in the throes of change. There are fear and perplexity among the nations. They have not yet learned one with another to rely upon truth, justice, and moral force. War, in spite of reason, is the ultima ratio of all disputes. It is a pity that it is so; but while men deplore the fact, they cannot alter it. The impression that it is dangerous to remain unprepared is so strong, that it is useless to argue with it. All men, except the amiable enthusiasts who dream of universal peace, confess that one great means of preserving peace is to be ready for war, just as, in a country where there is no law, the man of known thews and sinews is not so likely to be insulted or assaulted by the insolent or the dishonest as the man who has no physical force to command respect. Even the unhappily large class of persons in England, who suffer from the excess of taxation, will not, if they question themselves closely, consent to run the risk of defencelessness. Mr. Cobden seems to have been aware of this feeling, and to have given the motion the vagueness which characterised it, because he saw the futility of urging any specific reduction in the face of it.

Nevertheless, Mr. Cobden's speech was a valuable one. It was not only a triumphant answer to the charge brought against him, of being dogmatic and arbitrary in the selection of the estimates of a particular year as those which should form the starting-point for future Chancellors of the Exchequer; but highly useful, as showing how imperceptibly a nation may be dragged into a large expenditure. Bit by bit our forces have been increased; by slow but sure degrees we have added five thousand men here, and five thousand there; and until Mr. Cobden took up the matter, no one was found to raise a warning voice, and ask the Government where it was leading us to. His vindication of himself for selecting the year 1835 as the "model" financial year, and the sum of ten millions sterling as the reduction that should be aimed at, was clever and telling. He proved that Mr. Pitt himself adopted a similar course. After the American war, that great statesman returned to the estimates of the year preceding the war. After the French war, Mr. Pitt wished to return to the estimates of 1792. The present Marquis of Lansdowne took the same course in 1816; and Whigs and Tories have alike supported such views of Financial Reform, based upon the estimates of years that might be considered average and not exceptional. This was Mr. Cobden's vindication of himself for selecting the year 1835; and most of those who heard it, acknowledged it to be successful.

Upon the whole it is admitted, that although Mr. Cobden has been unsuccessful in his motion, he has done good service by bringing it forward. The attention of the country had been too much withdrawn from our financial condition: successive Chancellors of the Exchequer had become careless and extravagant: they had acted upon the principle of the old popular saying, that when the "cat was asleep the mice might play." A proof of popular vigilance was necessary to keep them upon their good behaviour. The very rumour of Mr. Cobden's motion has led to a promised reduction of £1,500,000; which, in all probability, we should not have heard of this year, had he not joined in the agitation of the Financial Reformers. The Government has, in fact, received a warning from the debate, which is likely to prove but the first of a series; and, although the motion has failed to pledge the Legislature to any specific economy, there is reason to anticipate a little more care in financial matters than the country has hitherto been accustomed to receive from the Reformed Parliament.

THE CAPTURE OF MOULTAN.

In our Journal of last week we recorded this grand success of our army in India. We are now enabled to illustrate a stage of the event; and add a few episodal passages from the accounts of the action.

"The new invention, gun-cotton, was used, from the commencement, by the [illegible] with terrific effect [illegible] with such rapidity and efficiency. Information arrived that the most awful destruction had been occasioned in the town by our shell and shot practice, a granary in the fort had been blown to and burned, and another small magazine exploded. All night our batteries continued to play on the enemy, and early on the morning of the 30th our great guns opened their fire, but slowly at first, on the batteries and ramparts of the town and fort.

"One of the grandest and most awful occurrences of the siege now took place —the blowing up of the principal magazine in the fort of Moultan. The explosion was so terrific, and the general effect, from the fall of rubbish, boughs of trees, &c., so startling, that at first it was thought the place had been visited by an earthquake. For a short time the huge column of dust, which was thrown some 200 yards in height, rendered the fort and surrounding objects invisible; there was, consequently, a brief pause in the firing; but as soon as the smoke and dust cleared away, the fire was resumed as briskly as ever. The artilleryman who levelled the mortar that produced the explosion was at once presented by General Whish with three gold mohurs, and an additional [illegible] for the [illegible] It is [illegible] and [illegible] Persian at the time the magazine exploded; also that the Dewan himself received a wound. This last report, however, does not seem to have been true. Our guns were now directed to the supposed positions of Mooltaj's remaining magazines, but without avail, as no further explosions took place. It is now evident that great devastation had been caused by our incessant fire; as besides the breaches of masonry, heaps of brickwork, and crumbling walls could be seen by looking through a telescope, while the principal bastions appeared riddled by our 24-lb. shot."

The following extracts from a letter written on New Year's-day give a good idea of the progress of the siege:—

"9 A.M.—Several beautiful shots have just been fired; the bastions and overhanging buildings are in a crumbling state. Masses of brick-work and rafters cover the whole surface of the fort. Lieutenant Playfair, of the 52d Native Infantry, died of his wound last night.

"11 A.M.—Our great guns are now playing on the fort wall at the bastion near the tomb of Bahawul Huk. The attack which we have taken place on the city has been postponed for some reason.

"2 P.M. No attack to-day; a tremendous fire with shot and live shell has blown a partial breach in the fort walls. The fire in the granaries is still raging, and the blaze very much increased. The beautiful mosques, tombs, and trees are very much damaged by the enemy's fire; they will furnish memorials of the hot contest for a century at least.

"P.M. Our breach is fast increasing in size; the very perfection of artillery practice has made short work of the massive rampart; a different game have Mooltaj's heroes to accomplish the work in the shortest possible time. I have just heard that the explosion of their magazine killed a great number of their troops; no less than 300 were engaged in making cartridges on the roof of it! The relief's have just taken place, and some more heavy guns are going into battery. To our great surprise the enemy have opened a heavy cannonade on them; we thought that nearly all their guns were silenced. The garrison have sworn to die at their posts, and up to the present time evince every disposition to do so, and the loss of life on both sides will be great."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

COST OF THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.—The estimates of the sums which will be required to defray the expenses of the Ordnance Department for the ensuing year, ending the 30th of March, 1850, have been printed. The total sum which will be required for the effective and non-effective services, military and civil, is £2,634,370. The gross estimate for the year 1848 was £3,022,142. The decrease in the present estimate therefore amounts to £387,873. The saving proposed to be made is principally under the heads of "Ordnance, land, and service," and "Works, buildings, and repairs:" the former amounting to £179,167, and the latter to £109,277. The following are the items for which provision will have to be made: Pay, allowances, and contingencies of certain military corps, £211,556 (being a diminution on the vote of last year of £4459); commissariat and barrack supplies for her Majesty's forces, clothing for colonial corps, &c., £201,656 (diminution £14,681); ordnance ships, stores, and victualling, £111,500 (diminution £1,000); Ordnance lands and quit-rents in the United Kingdom and colonies, £316,373 (diminution £78,84); wages of artificers and labourers in the United Kingdom and colonies, £141,000 (diminution £17,337); ordnance stores for land and sea service, £393,418 (diminution £7,76,167); works, buildings, and repairs, £508 205 (diminution £109,277).

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.—A return obtained by Mr. Hume shows that the total number of commissioned and non-commissioned officers of all ranks amounted in 1847 to 139,816, against 121,134 in 1840, 101,014 in 1835; and 109,014 in 1829; thus exhibiting an increase of 30,803 in the space of nineteen years. The force is also divided in 1847: in India, 1868 officers, 2405 non-commissioned officers, and 29,370 privates, corporals, and farriers; in the colonies, 467 officers, 651 non-commissioned officers, and 8232 privates, corporals, and farriers; and in the land forces (exclusive of those above), 4018 officers, 6972 non commissioned officers, and 86,050 privates, corporals, and farriers. The Indian forces have been increased since 1829, from 54,129 to 97,261; the colonial corps, 3426 to 8350; and the land forces, from 84,122 to 97,081. The total number [illegible] pensioners, amounted on the 1st of January, 1847, to 46,425, and to 46,034 in the East Indies (total 77,110), against a total of 70,621 in January 1840, 45,034 in January 1835, and 62,719 in January 1829. The effective force (including all ranks) employed in Great Britain amounted, in January, 1847, to 30,709; in January, 1840, to 29,799; in January, 1835, to 23,559; and in January, 1829, to 22,856. The number of troops employed on the "public service," exclusive of India, amounted in January, 1847, to 105,094; in January, 1840, to 88,961; in January, 1835, to 80,937; and in January, 1829, to 85,140. The effective force employed in Ireland was, in January, 1847, 28,020; in January, 1840, 26,640; in January, 1835, 21,780; in January, 1829, 24,604. The return shows an increase of numbers in all the branches of the public service.

MILITARY TESTIMONIAL.—A handsome silver snuff-box has been presented by the sergeants of the 7th Dragoons, their late respected Serjeant-Major Henry Wheeling, at a dinner in their mess-room, in Chatham Barracks, on the occasion of his leaving that regiment, after a service of upwards of [illegible] nearly eight as a sergeant-major. Upon the lid of the box, around the inscription-plate, are grouped the Royal Arms, military insignia, &c., handsomely chased.

EDUCATION IN THE ARMY.—It is intended that, in addition to the other plans in operat on for imparting knowledge to the officers and men of the British army, it is intended by the Commander-in-Chief that district and garrison schools shall be established, upon the plan of those which were formed and conducted by Lord Frederick Fitzclarence. The results of the experiment of Lord Frederick were of so satisfactory a character, that we can only, under the restrictions of our space, express an earnest hope that the rumour to which we have referred may prove to be well founded. One thing is quite certain; a system of examinations, preparatory to the grant of commissions, and to the promotion of officers, is decided on.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The HABEAS CORPUS ACT SUSPENSION (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed, and the marriages and Registration of Births (Scotland) Bills passed through committee. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

COMPENSATION TO BRITISH SUBJECTS BY THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.—In reply to Mr. S. CRAWFORD, Lord J. RUSSELL said the French Government had received satisfactory assurances from the French Government of the readiness to pay to the British workpeople expelled from France the sums lodged by them in the savings' banks; but there was difficulty in ascertaining the persons entitled to these sums.

RECTORY OF BISHOPWEARMOUTH.

Mr. HORSMAN, after referring at considerable length to the circumstances attending the re-entry of Bishopwearmouth, and with the view of giving Lord J. Russell a further opportunity of explanation, inasmuch as it was now understood his former one was neither satisfactory nor correct, begged to ask whether in any of the points referred to in the public Lord's Tenant answer as to the gross income of the rectory, the future income of the incumbent, the application of the surplus revenue, or the feeling of the parishioners as represented by the ancient vestry, there was anything requiring correction.

Lord J. RUSSELL replied that on the third point there had certainly been an error, not as the hon. gentleman supposed in the statement sent by the Bishop of Durham, but in his (Lord J. Russell's) reading of it. The Bishop of Durham stated that the wayleaves and coal rents would be placed in the hands of trustees for the benefit of the chapelries, amounting to £1600 a year; and on the honourable member's asking whether that sum would be paid to the incumbents of the other chapelries, his reply was, concluding that that was the contemplated arrangement, in the affirmative. In that information, however, it appeared he had been mistaken, the actual state of the case being as the Bishop of Durham informed him, that "After the 13th (not the 30th) of May the funds arising from wayleaves and coals will be paid to trustees (the Mayor, &c.). They will pay to each chapelry at least the amount they at present receive, so long as the wayleaves remain. Any surplus will be put into the funds, to accumulate for the spiritual benefit of the parish and district, but not to add one farthing to the income of the incumbent. Among other objects greatly desired is the building of a church at Hendon, in the parish of Bishopwearmouth, some two or three miles from the mother church." Now, I am told, 30,000 inhabitants. I have little doubt but we shall improve the present payments of the chapels, in proportion to the population; but so long as the produce of the wayleaves remains unsettled, we do not think it prudent to hold out expectations which it may not be in "our power to gratify." As to the last point, whether the inhabitants generally were satisfied with the arrangement, the statement he had received was that the memorialists who had addressed the bishop were satisfied, and that had been his answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HORSMAN asked whether, in the noble Lord's opinion, the bishop had any authority to divert any portion of the temporalities provided by law to the incumbent to any other purpose?

Lord J. RUSSELL did not consider the bishop would have any authority to divert the revenues settled by law as the income of the living, whether arising from rents or other sources, and if that had been done in any case he imagined there would be a legal remedy.

FINANCIAL REFORM.

Mr. HUME [illegible] that, in the present state of the finances, her Majesty's Ministers, before the estimates were voted, should submit a general financial statement of the revenues and expenditure for the ensuing year.

On the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply,

Mr. COBDEN rose, and moved, as an amendment, the following resolution:—

"That the net expenditure of the Government for the year 1835 (Parliamentary paper, No. 260, 1847), amounted to £44,422,000; that the net expenditure for the year ended 5th January, 1849 (Parliamentary Paper, No. 1, 1849), amounted to £54,185,000; the increase of nearly ten millions having been caused principally by successive augmentations of our warlike establishments and outlays for defensive armaments. That no foreign danger, nor necessary cost of the civil Government, nor indispensable disbursements for the services of the year, denies absolutely the continuance of this increase of expenditure. That it [illegible] and [illegible] impede the operations of [illegible] agriculture and manufactures, and [illegible] labour in all branches of productive industry, thereby increasing pauperism and crime, and adding grievously to the local and general burthens of the people. That, to diminish these evils, it is expedient to take steps to reduce forthwith the annual expenditure, with all practicable speed, to an amount not exceeding the sum which, within the last fourteen years, has been proved to be sufficient for the maintenance of the security, honour, and dignity of the nation."

The honourable gentleman commenced the speech with which he prefaced these resolutions by briefly explaining the objects which he had in view in thus submitting them to the House. He had not the slightest idea that the amount of our financial position should precede the discussion of the estimates in detail. He did not wish the House to think that he entertained the idea that the course proposed to be could be carried into effect at the present moment. He had simply come to ask the House to enter upon such an inquiry, was the increase which we have had in our expenditure for the last few years necessary? He closely connected with extravagance in our imperial expenditure. The honourable gentleman then justified himself by precedent for reverting to the standard of expenditure afforded by the year 1835. He then compared the expenditure of 1835 with that of last year. The increase during the interval had been about ten millions. Looking at the items of our expenditure, he contended that there was but one question with which any very great reduction could be effected—the item connected with our military establishment. He then pointed out the successive additions which had been made to the army, navy, and ordnance since the peace of 1815, to protect us against the Russians. Where was the danger from the Russians now?—and yet the 9000 men still remained in the navy. No less than 8000 men were added to the army, to meet the exigency of the Canadian rebellion. That rebellion had been suppressed in a few months, but the 8000 men we had to the present day. When the Chartist disturbances were going on in 1848, we had a war again increased to the extent of 5000 men. These disturbances had disappeared, but no return was made to the former standard of the army. Our difficulties in China, our interference, with France, and the Lord Ashburton mission to America, in 1841, led to the addition of 5000 sailors to the navy: the difficulties, interferences, and disputes had passed away, but the 5000 sailors still remained on our hands. In the following year we had a war of 6000 men, to enable us to meet the exigencies of the Maine boundary question; the treaty of Washington put an end to that question, but the increase was perpetuated. In 1845 a dispute arose between ourselves and America respecting the Oregon boundary. An addition was that year made to our military estimates of no less than £1,700,000. That dispute was happily terminated, but no reduction has since been made in the expenditure. In 1846 the question of the Spanish marriages caused a further addition of one million to the estimates. But there was no danger from that question now, and why should this addition be continued? Not one of the causes which had led to these successive augmentations to our army, navy, and ordnance now remained. Indeed, so far as our foreign relations were concerned, we were on a far better footing now than in 1835, when our military expenditure was comparatively low. They were told that our establishments were too low that year, but this he denied. Having shown that there was nothing in the present relations of our foreign policy to justify our present expenditure, the honourable gentleman then proceeded to examine how far our military outlays on our colonies were justifiable by the real circumstances of each case. He contended that our expenditure very large reductions might be made. And the same as to our armaments at home, which he endeavoured to show were on a much larger scale than necessary. He then contended that he had demonstrated that neither the state of our foreign [illegible] justified the disbursement of upwards of £18,000,000 a year upon the army, navy, and ordnance; and if so, he challenged the House to show any reason why they should not, as rapidly as practicable, retrace their steps, and until they had reached the standard of 1835. It was not necessary for him then to state what, in his opinion, should be done with the money which would be saved by reduction. He would, however, remind the agriculturists that those was no use in attending agricultural meetings and promising the repeal of the malt-tax to the farmers, unless they put themselves in a position to repeal that and other taxes by a reduction of expenditure. He then endeavoured to impress the House with the danger attendant upon our present system of expenditure, the danger greater than any which we need apprehend from the designs of foreign powers. He would not confine his reductions to our military outlays, as he thought that the pruning knife might be judiciously applied to the civil establishments. The honourable gentleman concluded by moving his resolution, and resumed his seat amid loud cheers.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, though dissenting from the views expressed by Mr. Cobden, could not but bear his testimony to the spirit and temperance with which he had brought before the House the important question of our military expenditure, since 1835, alluded to by the honourable gentleman, had received the sanction of large majorities of the House, and this being so, it was not likely that these augmentations had been wrong or unnecessary. The question which was before the House was one of military, and in meeting the case made by the honourable gentleman, he would do so more in a general way than in detail. He took no exception to Mr. Cobden's reference to a former year, and he was as much at liberty to refer to 1835 as to any other previous year. But, the House having been referred to that year, there were two questions for them to consider; the first, whether adequate provision had then been made for the public service, and whether the circumstances of the country had not since greatly changed, rendering a larger expenditure necessary than during the year in question. He then proceeded to show that it would not be consistent with the true interests of the country to effect reductions in our military establishments to the extent proposed. Life and property had to be protected at home, and trade and commerce to be protected abroad, and neither of these great ends of Government could be satisfactorily attained were the country at once to revert to the standard of its military expenditure in 1835. The right honourable gentleman then proceeded to show the grounds upon which the successive additions which had been made to the number of men both in the navy and army were perfectly justifiable. A large increased expenditure had lately been incurred in the necessary creation of a steam navy, an expenditure which might now be greatly reduced, and in which some considerable reductions had already been made. Great improvements had also recently been made in the manufacture of arms, and much expense had been incurred in providing our forces with improved weapons, without which it would be both cruel and impolitic to send it into the field. But expenses of this nature were only temporary in their character, and much of the augmentation complained of consisted of such expenses. It had, therefore, not been without reason that the greater part, at least, of these augmentations had been made. He was as favourable as any one could be to practical retrenchment, but he was not prepared to say that the reductions which had been proposed by Mr Cobden. He then proceeded to show that the Government had not been unmindful of its duty as regarded its care of the pockets of the people. We were now in a very different position from that which we occupied about this time last year. Our foreign relations were in a much more satisfactory condition than then, nor was there now any prospect of a disturbance of the peace at home. It was these considerations that had induced the Government to come to the conclusion of proposing some reductions to the House which it would not otherwise have felt it its duty to do. He then proceeded to show that the power of proposing a considerable reduction both in the army and navy. The army, last year, stood at 1,3 000. It was now proposed to reduce it to 103,000 men, being a reduction of 10,000 men. A reduction in the expenditure was effected last year, without a reduction of our force, to the extent of £628,800. The reductions in the estimates of this year, as compared, not with the original, but with the revised, estimates of last year, would amount, in connexion with the navy, to upwards of £730,000; in connexion with the army, to about £378,624; and in connexion with the ordnance, to £337,873; these reductions amounting in all to £1,447,353. As compared with the original estimates of last year, they would amount to £2,275,873. The income of the year up to the 5th of January was £52,933,093. The expenditure, exclusive of the Kaffir war, and some other items, had been £51,953,340, leaving a surplus of about £970,000, which remained as a balance of income over expenditure. He calculated that next year he would lose on corn about £780,000. There was then the sum of £380,000 which he could not calculate upon again as appropriations in aid, whilst he had last year received £80,000 of China money—a sum which he could not reckon upon receiving for the coming year. He would then lose upon the whole about £1,360,000. But, as he had already shown, the reductions which would be proposed would amount, as compared with their revised estimates of last year, to £1,447,353. The reductions contemplated, therefore, would exceed the loss of revenue on which they might calculate for the coming year, so that there was every reason to believe that the expenditure would be within the income of next year, although the hon. Member would appear to estimate it at a million and a half. Having shown that it would not be wise to make at once the large reductions proposed by Mr. Cobden, and that the Government had not been unmindful of its duty in connexion with the question, he expressed a hope that the House would give a decided expression of opinion against such sweeping reductions as were contemplated by the amendment.

After a few words from Mr. JOHN O'CONNELL and from Sir DE LACY EVANS, personal to Mr. Cobden,

Mr. HUME visited the chief blame of our extravagant expenditure upon the guilty conduct of the House of Commons. What the country looked for was a reduction of expenditure and a diminution of taxation, but all that the Government could promise for the coming year was to keep the expenditure within their income.

Mr. HERRIES observed that the real question before the House was, whether or not they would, before going into Committee of Supply, affirm a resolution binding themselves to reduce the expenditure to a certain amount. Whatever Mr. Cobden might now say about reduction with "all practicable speed," this was the real question before the House. He could not altogether agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in [illegible] which he had [illegible] Instead of [illegible] House and the other out of doors. What they ought to do was to be decorous in one place and violent in another, he (Mr Herries) would prefer that he should be violent in the House, where violence would be impotent, and decorous out of doors, where influence might be exercised. He was ready to take steps to yield to a pressure from without. He concluded by observing that, in his opinion the conduct of the Government last session had had much to do with the promotion of that agitation of which it was now beginning to feel the effects. He drew some consolation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, and was glad to find that some reductions might be effected, for no party in the House could be averse to such reductions as could be made without impairing the efficiency of the public service. He was ready to go along with Mr. Cobden, if he would only go at a safe pace. The right honourable gentleman then proceeded to contrast the expenditure of England and France with that of Ireland, and contended that the latter could be reduced, was materially favourable to this country. He trusted that the discussion of the estimates would be approached in a proper spirit, and that, whilst every effort should be made safely to reduce expenditure, the public service would be effected, merely to yield to a pressure from without. He concluded by observing that, in his opinion, the present state of Ireland was not the condition of Ireland justified any great retrenchment, so far as our military establishments were concerned.

Mr. M. GIBSON thought that it could not be very consolatory to the agriculturists to see that the Government had come to them with slender hopes of a reduction of expenditure, for it was solely upon a reduction of expenditure that must be grounded whatever was proposed in the nature of relief to the tenant farmer. He, for one, would not be satisfied with anything less than to increase our financial strength, an object in which all classes were equally interested

After a few words from Mr. Urquhart, Mr. M'Gregor, Mr. Anstey, and Colonel Sibthorp,

Mr. BRIGHT, at much length, spoke in support of the amendment.

Mr. DRUMMOND was somewhat suspicious of the new friends to the farmer, from had suddenly start up behind the Treasury bench. He would ask of the farmers, however, not to trust their enemies even when they came with gifts. Our armaments should only be reduced with reference to the situation of this country and that of foreign states; but that consideration was entirely lost sight of by those who supported the amendment

The House then divided, and the numbers were—

For the amendment (Mr. Cobden's resolution) ..	.. 78
Against it	.. 275
Majority against	.. 197

The amendment being rejected, the House went into Committee of Supply pro formâ, the committee to sit again on Friday.

The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill then went through committee.—Adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

ROYAL ASSENT.—The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Inland Revenue and Land Tax Commissioners, Suspension (Ireland) Bills.

IRISH POOR-LAW COMMITTEE.

Lord STANLEY, with the object of bringing the question of attacking the causes which the Government had pursued with respect to the committees of either House on the subject of the Irish Poor-laws, moved that a message be sent to the Commons requesting them to send a copy of the minutes of evidence taken by those on the subject. The noble Lord proceeded to indicate the course which had been taken in the House of Lords. The committee having been appointed, on the motion of the noble Lord, to inquire into the Irish Poor-law and to which resolutions before the committee, but declined to pledge himself as to the measures on which the Government had come to a positive conclusion, and which related to various subjects in connexion with the Irish Poor-law of which it was thought that information should be received. This was a proper course, no doubt; but he was surprised to learn that in the other House of Parliament a very different course had been pursued. There it appeared the First Lord of the Treasury had declared that the resolutions were submitted to the Government, that they adopted them, and if the committee of the House of Commons should concur the noble Lord said they would be submitted to Parliament on the responsibility of Government alone. The next step was a motion made in the committee by members not connected with the Government, that such resolutions as unanimously received should be [illegible] ment, the First Lord of the Treasury does aring that her Majesty's Government would permit no investigation to take place. There was an inconsistency in the course pursued by different members of the Government, which it was impossible to reconcile with the respect due to either House of Parliament, to the noble Marquess, or to the general sense of the public opinion of the country. After referring to the state of Ireland, and of Irish landlords, as affected by the operation of the Present Poor-laws, the noble Lord concluded by expressing his hope that the Government would reconsider their determination of separating the question of a rate in aid from the remainder of the question, or that the proposition would not be pressed on the House of Commons, until their Lordships, from the evidence to be given before their committee, had satisfied themselves whether it ought to be considered alone or not.

The Earl of CLARENDON, after deprecating [illegible] taken in reference to this subject, and referring to the proceedings before the Committee of the Commons, said: "It appeared to him that the course taken by the Commons, however anxious they might be to obtain complete information, arose from the conviction of immediate assistance being necessary to be afforded to the Irish people to continue for the next few months. He certainly had no intention in saying that no reasons no separation has been place between the first resolution and those which immediately followed, because, if the question of a temporary rate in aid was to be entertained by Parliament, he thought it ought to be in connexion with the other question of establishing a maximum of poor-rate in all the counties of Ire and, and no consideration on earth would induce him to assent to a measure the effect of which should be to render the rate in aid permanent. Upon the whole, he thought it would be found that there existed an apparent rather than a real discrepancy between the course pursued by the two committees.

Lord BROUGHAM expressed his pleasure at hearing the reluctance with which the noble Marquis had given his assent to a rate, and he hoped the recent £50,000 grant would be the last made to Ireland.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

DUBLIN IMPROVEMENT BILL.—A division took place on the question that this bill be "now" read a second time, which proposition was negatived by a majority of 16, the numbers being 23 to 39; a further division took place on the question whether it should be read a second time "that day six months," or "that day fortnight," when the latter motion was carried by a majority of 26, the numbers being 71 to 45.

TITHES.

On the order of the day for the second reading of St. Mary's, Whitechapel, Tithes and Easter Offerings Bill, having been read.

Mr. OSBORNE opposed the bill, on the ground that its object was to give the rector of Whitechapel a permanent and annual income of £1000 (or three which had never hitherto produced more than £300, and moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Mr GLADSTONE supported the measure, contending that the question was, not whether the rector should have a fixed income of £1000 a year, but whether some fixed sum should be given in lieu of the present uncertain and disputed remuneration.

SIR W. CLAY said the parishioners of Whitechapel, though they were anxious the question should be settled by arbitration, were not anxious for the arbitration of Parliament.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL and Mr. G. THOMPSON opposed the measure, which was supported by Mr. GOULBURN and Mr. E. BOUVERIE, who contended that the object was not to give the rector a farthing more than he was legally entitled to, and that, by the establishment of a rector's rate, as was done in other parishes.

Sir D. L. EVANS, with reference to the feelings of the inhabitants of Whitechapel on the subject, said that at a public meeting held on the 25th of January, a resolution was unanimously come to hostile to the bill. He would suggest that it be postponed in order to afford time for an amicable arrangement.

The House then divided, when the second reading was negatived by a majority of 19, the numbers being 70 to 89; the bill was consequently lost.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.—LORD PALMERSTON, in reply to Mr. Anstey, said, the Austrian Government held that they were entitled to maintain the territorial distribution established at Vienna, but no guarantee was given by the contracting Powers. The noble Lord, also, in answer to Mr. B. Cochrane, responded that he should object to lay on the table the instructions given to Sir S. Canning when he visited Athens on the Pacifico compensation business. And, in answer to Mr. Bankes, as to some of the arms used at the insurrection in Sicily having come from her Majesty's stores, the noble Lord stated, that the contractor for guns for the Ordnance had applied for and received permission to receive back some of those he had furnished, in order to execute an order he had received from Sicily, which request was granted.

JAMAICA.—Mr. HAWES, in reply to Mr. P. Miles, said that a despatch had been received from the Governor of Jamaica, which he would lay on the table. It was true that a [illegible] bill had been passed by the Legislative Council, a delay had taken place in voting the supplies. The Governor, however, had stated that he had himself defended himself and Lord Grey in consequence of a question put by Mr. Baillie as to whether the despatches to be presented to the Ceylon committee were to be unread.

CALIFORNIA.—Lord PALMERSTON, in reply to Mr. Wyld, said he had no intention of appointing a Consul to California at present, as there was no form of government there with whom he could communicate. He might, to be sure, communicate with the gold-finders.

RAILWAY COMPANIES.—Mr. LABOUCHERE replied, in answer to Mr. Sanders, that if he found the bill of last session did not enable embarrassed railway companies to wind up their affairs, he should be glad to amend it. His apprehension was, that bill was of a prospective and not a retrospective character.

THE RIVER PLATE.—Mr. EWART wished to ask a question of the noble lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, with respect to the affairs of the River Plate, to which, on a former occasion, the noble lord had not given as unambiguous a reply as could have been desired by the parties interested. He would, first, to ask him whether the Government entertained a hope of effecting a settlement of these affairs; secondly, whether the reception of our new envoy to Buenos Ayres had been such as to justify the hope of a favourable settlement; and thirdly, what was the present state of the negotiations with respect to these affairs?—Lord PALMERSTON said that it would occupy some time to detail with accuracy the present state of these negotiations. Briefly, however he might state that a proposition had been made by the English and French governments which had not been accepted, and that it remained for the French Government to determine whether they would make any fresh proposals. Mr. Southern had not yet been received officially, but he had been received in private with great cordiality, and he might say with distinction. Mr Southern had been received by General Rosas, and there was reason to believe that in a short time he would be permitted to present his credentials. Expectations were not exceed four thousand pounds. (Laughter.) Lord Palmerston) saw no reason why a satisfactory arrangement should not be come to.

LAW LECTURES.—Mr EWART begged to ask her Majesty's Attorney-General whether any steps had been taken by the Inns of Court, in pursuance of the recommendations of the committee on legal education, to establish preliminary exam nations and lectures on the law?—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he believed each Inn of Court had appointed a lecturer to deliver lectures on the various branches of legal knowledge. That course, he believed, had been adopted on the suggestion of the select committee; but it had not been found to be successful. In the Inner Temple a barrister of high reputation had been appointed at a considerable expense. but the attendance on his lectures had not been such as to warrant the Benchers in making them. In Gray's-inn, he believed, the lectures had been better attended.

FACTORY OPERATIVES.—SIR G. GREY, in answer to Mr. Hindley, replied that a bill on the subject of working in factories by the Easter recess, but it would be unadvisable to say anything as to its provisions until he moved for leave to lay it on the table.

In answer to Mr. H. Herbert, Sir G. Grey intimated that it was quite true many prisoners under sentence of transportation in Ireland had been detained in the gaols for a longer period than usual; but that arose from the largely-increased number of convictions, and the Government were doing all in their power for their removal.

The case of the family of the late Ex-Rajah of Satara was again referred to at the instance of Mr. HUME; and after a short discussion, his motion for alphabetical lists of all persons receiving allowances from the public money was postponed; Lord J. RUSSELL stating he would endeavour to ascertain whether it could be acceded to without incurring a great expense.

BUCKINGHAM SUMMER ASSIZES BILL.—Mr. DUNNE moved the second reading of this bill, its object being to enable the assizes to be held at Aylesbury, if it should be deemed desirable.—The Marquis of CHANDOS opposed the bill, because it was not in accordance with the opinion of the magistrates in the north of the county, and moved that it be read a second time that day six months.—SIR G. GREY said, the bill merely placed the county of Buckingham in the same position as the other counties, with regard to which the Queen in Council had the power of changing the place for holding the assizes; and as the magistrates would have the opportunity of opposing any application to the Queen, he trusted the noble Lord would not press its amendment. The Marquis of CHANDOS, in consequence of the assurances that the magistrates would still have the power of objecting, withdrew his amendment, and the bill was then read a second time Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon till six o'clock.

The Insolvent Members Bill was referred to a Select Committee. Mr. GREENE having suggested to Mr. Moffatt that course, and Sir G. Grey having approved of it.

PUBLIC ROADS.

Mr. G. C. LEWIS moved the second reading of the Public Roads Bill, which (he said) resolved itself into two parts: that which related to the machinery and details of future management; and that which related to the debts which had been incurred by the Roads. The measure was framed on the recommendation by Sir James Graham for the South Welsh counties, with the exception that in that act the highway rates were not touched, nor was any equivalent given to the county rate for the land upon it: but by the present bill it was proposed to give nearly a million and a half to that rate, and to entrust its administration as far as possible to local authorities. It was proposed to remodel that portion of the bill which related to an extension of the debt. From returns laid before Parliament in 1845, it appeared that in round numbers the total amount of tolls throughout England amounted to £1,300,000, the debt to £6,000,000, and it was proposed to provide for the gradual extinction of that debt, that £1,300,000 shall be collected by a county board for the purpose of the debt, those purposes being the payment of interest at 4 per cent, and the formation of a sinking fund of 2 per cent, the latter amount to be paid over by commissioners to be appointed by the Secretary of State, who were to be empowered to compound with the bondholders; each bondholder receiving a debenture, who might apply to the commissioners sitting in sessions to have his debt paid off. The whole amount of interest on the debt and expenses of repairs, in round numbers, would require £1,130,000, which would leave a balance in favour of the trusts of £170,000. By this plan the whole debt might be extinguished in 28 years. With respect to unpaid interest, it was proposed that no interest should be recoverable for a period longer than ten years. With respect to the machinery, the constitution of the county road boards would also be a question for the committee; but he thought that placing all the roads in the country under the control of the county magistracy was a plan that would meet with general approbation. The bill proposed to take the limits of the Poor-law unions for the local boards; and it was thought that the Poor-law guardians as at present constituted might be entrusted with these additional powers, the management and expenditure being in the hands of the surveyors, the amount of the latter to be fixed by the boards.

The hon. gentleman concluded his observations by saying, that if the House should consent to the second reading, he should move that the bill on an early day be committed pro formâ for introducing amendments, that the bill as amended should be printed and circulated, and that the discussion should be taken on going into committee at some distant day.

Mr W. HUME acknowledged that the bill had been much improved, but he recommended that the second reading should be postponed for a fortnight, in order that the alterations made in it should be printed.

A lengthened discussion ensued, the general feeling of the House being in favour of Mr. Milne's suggestion.

Mr. C. LEWIS thereupon intimated his intention to withdraw the bill, with a view to reintroduce it with its amendments.

The bill was consequently withdrawn, and Mr. C. Lewis obtained leave to bring in a new bill.

IRELAND.

Sir H. W. BARRON moved the second reading of the Offences (Ireland) Bill, the object of which, he said, was to prevent the imprisonment for lengthened periods before trial of persons accused of trifling offences. He thought the measure would be not only an act of justice to the accused, but would be a saving of great expense to the counties.

Mr. H. DRUMMOND, in a strain of strong irony, dissected the provisions of the bill, and demonstrated its utter absurdity. So far from its being a bill to prevent imprisonment, the hon. member proved that it would, if carried, practically enable every Irishman to take every other honourable gentleman against whom he entertained a spite into custody.

Mr. E. B. ROCHE congratulated Sir H. Barron on having discovered a measure for Ireland even worse than the Habeas Corpus Act Suspension Bill.

Colonel DUNNE repudiated all connexion with the ridiculous bill. His name indeed appeared on the back of it; but he had never read it, nor had he a notion that it had been prepared.

Mr. STAFFORD declaimed all recognition of the honourable Baronet's queer bantling.

Sir G. GREY, as repudiation was the order of the day, on the part of the Government repudiated the bill. The right honourable gentleman pointed out other portions of the bill, besides those exposed by Mr. Drummond, as being the most ludicrous specimens of legislation possible to conceive. He recommended the honourable Baronet to withdraw it.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL likewise repudiated, and after some observations from Mr NAPIER and Mr. HERBERT, in condemnation of the bill,

Sir H. BARRON protested that it had not been drawn up by him, but by three assistant barristers.

After a very amusing succession of jokes at the expense of the hon. baronet and the assistant barristers who aided him, the bill was withdrawn.

The report of the Vice-Guardians of Unions (Ireland) Bill was received.

The Overseers (Cities and Boroughs) Bill went through committee.

The Out-door Paupers Bill also went through committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.—On the motion of the Marquis of SALISBURY, an address was ordered to be presented to her Majesty for an account of tolls received under the Turnpike Trusts Acts, from the 1st of January, 1844, to the 1st of January, 1849, distinguishing each year, with an account of those trusts which are in debt; amount of debt, whether arising from money borrowed upon the security of the tolls, the interest due thereupon, or other charges at the present time; the amount of money raised by highway-rate from Easter, 1837, to Easter, 1848, distinguishing each year; the amount of money contributed from the highway-rates to [illegible] during the same period.

The Consolidated Fund Bill was read a third time

After some explanations of the Earl of CARLISLE, in reply to the Marquis of SALISBURY, relative to the terms on which certain leases of Crown lands had been granted by the Woods and Forests to several individuals named, their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

BURDENS ON THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST

Mr. DISRAELI said on the table the resolutions which he had given notice on this subject. They are as follow:—

"That the whole of the local taxation of the country for national purposes falls mainly, if not exclusively, on real property, and bears with undue severity on the occupiers of land, in a manner injurious to the agricultural interests of the country, and otherwise highly impolitic and unjust.

"That this burdensome and unequal pressure is greatly aggravated by the fact, that more than one-third of the whole revenue derived from the Excise is levied upon agricultural produce, exposed, by the recent changes in the law, to direct competition with the untaxed produce of foreign countries, the home producer being thus subjected to a burthen of taxation, which, by greatly enhancing the price, limits the demand for British produce; and to restrictions which injuriously interfere with the conduct of his trade and industry.

"That this House will resolve itself into a committee of the whole House to take into their serious consideration such measures as may remove the grievances of which the owners and occupiers of real property thus justly complain, and which may establish a more equitable apportionment of the public burthens."

DIVISION OF ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICTS.

Lord ASHLEY moved that an humble petition be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to appoint a commission to inquire into the practicability and mode of subdividing, into districts and independent parishes, for all ecclesiastical purposes, all the densely-peopled parishes in England and Wales, in such manner that the population of each, except in particular cases at the discretion of the Commissioners, shall not exceed four thousand souls. He stated, in the outset, he wished to state without reserve that his proposition would not involve any grant or bounty, much less any grant of public money. (Hear, hear.) He believed he expressed the sentiments of the House when he stated that though they admitted the principle of making demands upon the public purse when economy required it, they were not in the matter; they were but imposed to look any pecuniary aid—any more, they should, on direct to resist any such demands until such time as the Church should have exhausted her own resources. (Hear, hear.) Large Thereby, the undertaking to the proposition would not involve any increase of the present amount of local taxation in the form of church-rates. Moreover he wished it to be understood that the Commissioners would not touch any of all existing rights, all existing incumbencies, which would only be dealt with as vacancies occurred, by death or otherwise. No one who had looked at the condition of densely-populated parts of the empire could have failed to observe the great want of proper parochial distribution, and the consequent difficulty of efficiently carrying out efficient parochial government. This was not the case in densely-populated districts in the country, where the population was equally numerous as many towns, they were well supplied with the means of religious instruction. All the densely-peopled districts were those which were destitute of the ordinances of religion. He would not trespass further on the attention of the House than to state the principle of his proposition, which was to divide the parishes into districts, and to endow them with the means of religious instruction. He would not trespass further on the attention of the House than to state the principle of his proposition, which was to divide the parishes into districts, and to endow them with the means of religious instruction. He would not trespass further on the attention of the House than to state the principle of his proposition, which was to divide the parishes into districts, and to endow them with the means of religious instruction.

Mr. PLUNKET then moved the appointment of a committee of five shareholders to examine into the matters, and to report to an adjourned meeting. (Agreed.)

The Chairman did not know what the hon. proprietor required more; he had told him that the company had sold his shares, and the question was whether he had done right in so selling them. (Cries of "No, no!" applause and excitement.)

Mr. Pearce said, several hundreds had been sold at that premium, and the shares were in the Stock Exchange was, that was an extravagant price given for them to get a quotation

The Chairman replied that was an imputation of motive, and was unfair. He had sold shares to large lots of private individuals, which were never in the Exchange at all, and if it some cases he got them lower than others, it made an average of them. He was, however, quite willing to abide by the decision of the meeting as to whether he was justified in selling the shares.

Mr. H. N. Love seconded the motion for appointing a committee.

The Chairman said he might have got wrong in the early stage of these share transactions, but, if he had made an error in the management, he had been right in many others. He had never directed his attention to this particular transaction; and, if he had done wrong, he was ready to refund the money. He would take all the shares back, if they liked, and give back all the interest to them. (Hear.)

Mr. Parsons contended that the question was not one of money, and that no explanation could be satisfactory without an inquiry. (Loud applause.)

The Chairman said that repayments was the question, because there was no doubt he was perfectly justified in selling the shares; the only point was, whether the price was too large. (Loud applause and cries of "Question.")

Mr. Love said there was no doubt about the price being too large.

The Chairman then let it be put right

Mr. H. N. Thompson said, he thought that in order to clear up the Chairman's character, and that of the other Directors, it was very desirable that an inquiry should take place. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Love thought it was as much due to the credit of Mr. Hudson as it was to the shareholders, that an investigation should take place, and that the committee should report without favour or affection towards any parties. (Hear.)

The Chairman said, if the shareholders wished it, he had not the least objection to a committee. (Hear.)

A committee was then appointed, consisting of Mr. Prance, Mr. Love, Mr. Denison, Mr. Clayton, and Mr. [illegible]

The report was then adopted, and a dividend of 5 per cent. declared.

IRELAND.

OPPOSITION TO THE RATE IN AID IN ULSTER.—Already the northern province is moved by a spirit of determined resistance to the rate in aid proposed by Lord John Russell; and Ulster, heretofore so free from agitation, is now excited from one end to the other. The Freeman's Journal, without distinction of party, opposes the new taxation with energy, and appeal to the people to meet in all quarters, to remonstrate against the injustice of taxing the north for the relief of "the improvident western squires and their paupers." Several meetings have been convened, and it appears likely, from the feeling of the day, that the movement will be universal throughout the province. In Fermanagh the county meeting, held last week, was one of the most numerous that has assembled in the memory of many years, and was composed of all parties (Orange and Green). The resolutions were very strong. One of them was to the effect that no English manufactured goods introduced into Ireland would be juster than the proposed rate in aid, and that we believe privately the presence of the present Poor-law. It was proposed, also, that the Imperial Exchequer, if it was found to be considered an integral part of the United Kingdom, should contribute towards a rate in aid when such was called for.

ELECTION OF AN IRISH REPRESENTATIVE PEER.—Writs have been issued from the Hanaper-office for the election of a representative peer, in the room of the late Lord Dunsany. It is understood that Lord Clarina will be chosen.

THE STATE PRISONERS IN KILMAINHAM.—An investigation ordered by the Government respecting the treatment to which, it is alleged, the six State prisoners, still confined in Kilmainham, have been subjected, commenced on Saturday last, before a commiss oner appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant.

Mr. Joseph Brenan has written a letter to the Freeman's Journal, calling upon Mr. Sergeant Sir George Stuart's statement in the House of Commons, that "all the prisoners had threatened to offend as Mr. Meany had offended," by writing articles for newspapers. Mr. Brenan says that Messrs. Meany and Rea were the only gentlemen of the six confined at Kilmainham who published any articles; he himself, with O'Higgins, Meyler, and Halpin, was willing to give a pledge to the contrary. Yet they also were "sent to the damp cells of the felon yard."

The vessel now emigrant ship, the Lord Sandys, was burnt at Kinsale (Ireland). Its value was £2000. No lives were lost. The vessel was insured.

Mr. Ross (of Rosstrevor), late M.P. for Belfast, has written to a Dublin paper to say that he has not disposed of his marine residence in that county to her Majesty, or to any person acting in the name of the Queen, as stated in a paragraph which has lately gone the round of the newspapers.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has received £30 from B. D., "in lieu of probate duty;" £5 from an anonymous correspondent, "on the assessed income-tax;" and £5 from a partner in a firm, which "received in drawback some years ago more than they were by law entitled to." These sums will be paid into the Exchequer.

The Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., is about to extend the advantages of the small allotment system, which has been found to have improved the condition of the labouring classes so much at Wilton, to the adjoining parish of Pangbourne St. Peter; and a suitable piece of land has been selected for the purpose

EARLY CLOSING ASSOCIATION.—The seventh annual meeting of the society, formed for the furtherance of early closing in all trades will be held at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday next, the Marquis of Blandford, M.P., in the chair, when a large attendance of the friends of the association is confidently expected.

THE MISSING STEAMER, "FORTH."

THE MISSING STEAMER, "FORTH."

By the West India mails, received on Tuesday, we learn that no intelligence of the loss of the Forth had reached Bermuda, or any other island touched by the Severn. It was presumed at Bermuda that the long detention of the Gulf mails arose from the extra work the Forth would have to perform, caused by the long outward voyage made by the Avon. "We fear, however," adds the account, "that the fact of no vessel having made her appearance by the 13th at Bermuda, is strong confirmatory evidence that the report of the Forth's wreck on the Alscranes was a true one."

Should this prove to be the case, the Forth will make the fifth large steamer lost by the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company since the commencement of their contract for carrying the West India mails in 1841. The steamers previously wrecked were the Medina, on the 12th of May, 1844, on a coral reef, near Turk's Island; the Isis, on the 5th of October, 1842, which sank off Bermuda, having previously struck on a reef; the Soheay, off Corunna, coast of Spain, on the 8th of April, 1843; and the Tweed, on the 12th of February, 1847, on the Alscranes rocks, Gulf of Mexico, the same reef upon which the unfortunate Forth was last seen by the vessel which took the news to Mobile. The Company also lost their inter-colonial steamer Antaeus, on the Nigrellos, near Carthagena, in 1844; and the schooner Lee, near Belize, Honduras, in 1848. The wrecks of the Soheay and Tweed were attended with peculiarly distressing circumstances, involving the loss of 120 lives; and in the case of the Tweed, with an amount of hardship and suffering to the survivors which has rarely found a parallel in the records of shipwrecks.

The cause of this succession of disasters is that the West India steamers, besides their long Atlantic voyages, have to call at a number of ports and islands, the navigation of which is especially dangerous and intricate, abounding with rocks and shoals, the ships at all times being exposed to currents of a dangerous nature, and to those sudden changes of weather, hurricanes, squalls, northers, &c., with which the West India Islands, Spanish Main, and Gulf of Mexico are so frequently visited.

These disasters cannot be attributed to the inefficiency of the vessels or their captains and officers, it being generally conceded that the working management of the Company is most able, the ships of the best description, both as regards hulls and machinery, and suitable by their mode of construction and equipment for the particular service in which they are employed; they are commanded and officered by intelligent and experienced men, whose general ability and knowledge of their profession and of the navigation of the West Indies is unquestioned, and whose vigilance and seamanship during their long and arduous voyages are incessantly called into exercise.

Regarding the loss of the Forth we are without any details which can at present lead us to conjecture how she could have been driven on the Alscranes reef. It is inferred that a norther was blowing, the effect of which was calculated to force the vessel on the Campeachy coast; and that Captain Sturdee, wishing to avoid this lee shore, made his course as much to the northward as he thought would enable him to pass the rocks at a safe distance; but that during the night, some current, temporary or otherwise, of which he was unaware, carried the ship so much further to the northward as to run the Forth upon the rocks. Although the report which has reached England is a very meagre one, yet it is consolatory to know that all hands were saved, and that assistance, even if not sought, was promptly obtained. Captain Sturdee is a very careful commander, and has been some years in the Company's service, having been formerly chief officer of the Thames under Captain Hart, R.N., Commodore of the Fleet.

The Forth, of which fine vessel we have engraved a view, was the largest of the Company's vessels, and had made sixteen successful voyages to the West Indies from Southampton. She left Southampton on the 2nd of September, and was on her seventeenth trip when the accident happened. She was of about 1900 tons burden, or 1147 tons register, and 450-horse power; built at Leith, in 1841, by Messrs. Menzies and Co. Messrs. Wilson, Nunn, and Higman were respectively first, second, and third officers; Mr. Agnus, chief engineer; and Mr. A. H. Strutt, purser. The Forth was shortly to have received new boilers, and undergone a thorough overhaul, at an expense of £12,000 to £15,000, being the second ship on the list for such repairs.

We are happy to be able to state that, beyond the present detention of the mails, the loss of the Forth will not interfere with the general regularity of the mail service, or prove detrimental to the finances of the Company, which, by the last annual report to the shareholders, were in a prosperous condition. The Company have been their own insurers for some years; and, to provide for contingencies and casualties, have a reserve fund, which, at the present time, without writing off the Forth's loss, amounts to no less a sum than £125,000, invested in Government securities. The actual value of the Forth at the time of her wreck may be estimated at £60,000.

WRECK OF THE BRIG "NEWCASTLE," OFF WHITBY.

This calastrophe occurred on the night of the 30-31st ult., when the Newcastle was making for the harbour at Whitby; and the tide swept the brig against the east pier, a portion of which is shown in the sketch, with the platforms, &c used for its extension. The vessel being very light, she was driven by a heavy surf close under the rocky cliffs, at about half a mile south-east of the port. Lieutenant Bainbridge, of the Whitby coast-guard with the crew under his command, immediately hastened to the heights, and threw, by means of rockets, two lines on board the brig; but they were not required, as the vessel drove so close up that the crew were able to land on a shelving piece of rock, by means of a line which they threw ashore. The wind was N.W., blowing fresh gales, with heavy surf; so that the brig eventually became a wreck.

THE LATE MR. GREEN, THE SHIPOWNER.

This eminent mercantile ship-builder died at his residence, at Blackwall, on the 21st ult., in the eighty-second year of his age. His life was a course of untiring enterprise. At the early age of fifteen he entered, as a draughtsman, the office of Mr. Perry, of Blackwall, who then occupied the premises now in the possession of the Messrs. Green. By attention to business he advanced in a short period to the head of his department, and soon afterwards married Miss Perry, the daughter of his employer, by whom he was subsequently taken into partnership. Of this marriage his only surviving child is Mr. Richard Green, the present head of the firm. The deceased gentleman married, secondly, Miss Onwhyn, daughter of Mr. Onwhyn, for many years coroner for the eastern division of Middlesex, by whom he had issue several children.

On the demise of Mr. Perry, Mr. Wigram became a partner, and the business was for many years carried on by Messrs. Green, Wigram, and Wells; but Mr. Green eventually soon became sole proprietor. To his enterprise is owing the pre-eminence which the British merchant-vessels have attained on the Indian and Chinese seas. He first laid on vessels in those quarters, at the expiration of the East India Company's Navigation Charter; and he has since sent forth some of the finest vessels that ever appeared upon water. Many of them were so constructed as to be available for the purposes of war at a very short notice.

The closing years of Mr. Green's life were almost exclusively devoted to munificent acts of charity. At his sole expense were erected the East India-road Schools; and, at his cost, were latterly supported, clothed, and educated, 1000 children. Attached to these schools is a chapel, which Mr. Green also endowed. He likewise founded the Sailors' Home at Poplar, the Green Free School, and the Blackwall Free School; and was a liberal benefactor to other institutions, too numerous to mention. His portrait worthily adorns the Town-Hall at Poplar, and from this picture the accompanying engraving has been sketched.

On Wednesday afternoon, the remains of Mr. Green were removed from his house at Blackwall for interment in a vault attached to the Sailors' Home Chapel; and, in respect to his memory, the shops in Poplar (in which parish the deceased had lived ever since he was thirteen years of age) and along the road through which the body was conveyed to its last resting-place were closely shut up; while nearly the entire population lined the thoroughfares, and appeared deeply impressed with the solemn scene. The demonstration was not confined to the inhabitants, as in the East and West India Docks every vessel had the flag of its nation half-mast high; while on the river the same expression of feeling was displayed. The following was the order of the mournful procession:—The police to clear the way, followed by the boys and girls of the Green Free School; about one hundred gentlemen, four abreast, of the Wesleyan persuasion, wearing silk hatbands and silk scarfs; the churchwardens, trustees, and overseers of the parish, four abreast; the children of the East India-road school (the girls dressed in black, and the boys with black armlets on the right arm); the hearse (drawn by four horses), containing the body of the deceased; two mourning-coaches—in the first were the four sons of the deceased; in the second, Mr. Hankey (the banker), his son-in-law, and the Rev. Mr. Dod; then followed the foreman, clerks, shipwrights, and mechanics in his service, and the children of the Blackwall Free School. There were about 1000 children connected with the schools in the procession.

Mr. Green is stated to have expended nearly £100,000 in founding charitable institutions in his neighbourhood, and in acts of benevolence to the poor, by whom his memory will long be cherished.

NEW JUSTICE-ROOM AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.

The old Justice-Room at the Mansion-House was noted for its many inconveniences, among which its smallness and exposure to the noise of traffic in the street were not the least objectionable. The City Clerk of the Works, Mr. Bunning, has just effected a two-fold improvement, by converting the Justice-Room into a handsome vestibule, appropriate to a palatial edifice; and constructing a new Justice-Room towards the rear of the Mansion-House, and thus avoiding the interruption from the street noises.

Our Illustration shows this new accommodation. It is a large and handsome apartment, lighted by a window of some architectural character, as well as by a light borrowed from the ball-room, which is immediately above this room. The Engraving shows the position of the Lord Mayor's chair, to the left of which is accommodation for the counsel and strangers.

The public will be great gainers by the change, there being more space allotted to them; and the heating and ventilation are perfect. The floor is covered with lead of considerable thickness, which greatly deadens the sound of footfalls.

ENFIELD AND EDMONTON RAILWAY.

The Act of Parliament for this short line was obtained in 1846, and passed through both Houses without difficulty.

The undertaking was, at first, projected by a few spirited inhabitants at Enfield, but, after the bill was passed, arrangements were made with the Eastern Counties Railway Company, who became proprietors of the line, and by whom it has been constructed, under the following direction:—M. A. Borthwick, Esq., Engineer; William Lawford, Esq., Superintendant Engineer; W. G. Lankfield, Esq., Surveyor; Thomas Earle, Esq., Contractor. The stations were designed by Mr. C. F. Cheffins, of Southampton-buildings, and were erected by Messrs. Curtis, of Stratford; and it is but justice to all the parties concerned in the execution of the works to say, that every thing has been done in a very creditable and efficient manner.

THE ENFIELD RAILWAY STATION.

The line is about three miles in length, and branches off from the Cambridge line, at the Old Edmonton (now Water-lane) station. It is nearly on a level, and the curves are favourable and unfrequent. The cost of construction of a line so near to London, and through a country principally cultivated as market-gardens, must be necessarily large; but the chief item of expense has been the making of a deviation of the Turnpike-road at Edmonton, to avoid the danger of crossing the Railway, which is here on a level with the public road. Level crossings, in large towns, are very common, as at Ware, Canterbury, Southampton, Peterborough, &c.; but the Metropolitan Road Commissioners thought it their duty to insist upon the deviation being made in this case, which has consequently been done at an expence of from £10,000 to £12,000.

The line was opened Thursday last, but no formal or public demonstrations took place on the occasion.

It does not present many features for Illustration, but we have engraved the fine old Mansion which has been converted into the Enfield Station.

THE LITTLE CHURCH AT GREENSTED.

A very interesting paper, illustrative of the history of this singular edifice, was read on the 19th ult., at the Royal Institute of British Architects, by T. H. Wyatt, Esq., Fellow.

We should premise that Greensted lies near Ongar, in Essex; and the interest attached to this little building arises from the materials of which it is constructed; from its undoubted antiquity; and from the strong evidence that exists of its having been originally built as a place for the reception of the corpse of St. Edmund, which, on its return from London to Bury St. Edmund's, in the year 1013, was, as Lydgate, a monk of that monastery (St. Edmund's) informs us, conveyed in a chest, or "forstory."

St Edmund began to reign in East Anglia, A D 35: he is supposed to have been killed in 16 years afterwards, and was buried at Thetford or Hoxgleden. His body is stated to have reposed there tranquilly for 33 years, when it was removed to Bury St. Edmund's, and it is a curious fact, that the first church erected to receive the body thus moved from Thetford was of wood. Next, in consequence of apprehensions from Danish invasion and spoliation, the body was moved to London, to "the Church of Christ;" and in the year 1013 reconveyed from London to the church at Bury. And, to strengthen the probability of the little structure at Greensted having received the body, on its route eastward, Mr. Wyatt quotes a MS. life of Sir Edmund, preserved at Lambeth Palace; and another MS quoted by Dugdale, in his "Monasticon," in which it is stated that "he (the body) was also sheltered near Aungre, where a wooden chapel remains until this day." The parish of Aungre, or Ongar, herein mentioned, adjoins that of Greensted, and through which the ancient road from London into Suffolk passed; so that no doubt has ever been entertained that this rough oaken fabric is "the wooden chapel near Aungre."

Mr. Wyatt then refers to the construction of churches of wood in Norway, about the twelfth century; and with us "there was a time," says the venerable Bede, "when there was not a stone church in all the land, but the custom was to build them all of wood." It is not, then, to be wondered at that, in a retired spot, for a purely temporary purpose, and in a country devoid of stone, wood should have been adopted as the material for a small structure, even of a very sacred kind. Mr. Wyatt then describes the inclosing walls as of oak: they were about six feet high, and formed of rough half trees, split or sawn asunder, and set upright, close to one another. These uprights were laid on an oak sill, tenoned into a groove, and secured with oak pins. The sill on the south side was laid on the actual earth; and that on the north side had, in two places, some rough flints, without any mortar. The roof-plates, also of oak, had a groove corresponding with the sill, into which the uprights were tenoned and pinned.

Mr. Wyatt states that the east end timbers were, no doubt, removed to make way for the red brick Tudor church, erected about the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII.; and there is no means of now ascertaining if the original form was a mere parallelogram, or if an apse was the eastern termination, as prevalent in the early churches. Some of the western timbers had been removed to make a doorway into the wooden tower, erected at the beginning of the seventeenth century. There is one bell, with this inscription:—"William Sand made me, 1618." The roof was heavy, and without any particular character. The covering was brick tile. The insides of the timbers were plastered, so that internally the character and interest of the construction was lost. The seats were of all sorts and heights, and offered some good specimens of the "cattle pen." The church was lighted by three dormer windows, of near "domestic" appearance; and an open wooden porch, without any style or beauty, gave access to the Church on the south side, by means of a very low door. There was, originally, a northern door, but this had long been walled up. How this little structure was originally lighted, whether by windows on the eastern side, or only by torch-light, as the sanctity of the place, and the precious nature of the relic it contained, might render probable, it is not now easy to determine; but, as Erasmus found the Chapel of our Lady at Walsingham lighted only by tapers, such may have been the case here; and it seems curiously confirmed by the following extract from a letter of the builder who has lately been engaged in the restoration of the Church: he says, "When the plaster was taken off the walls, I noticed a number of marks made by torch or candle, as if the latter had been stuck in a lump of clay, and the flame had come actually in contact with the wood. I also found in the centre of the nave, opposite the porch door, a quantity of burnt earth, as if a large fire had been made in the Church."

The restoration of the Church, which has been effected strictly in accordance with the original plan, is thus described in a letter in the Times, dated Jan. 5:—"In no case has a single entire timber been condemned, but every atom which decay had not rendered useless had been worked up. So rigidly has it been made a rule to replace everything just as it was found, that each tree has been reinstated precisely in the same spot which it has occupied for upwards of 800 years. The necessity for the Church being repaired arose from the decay of the sills, which literally crumbled to pieces when removed, and the butt ends of the timbers which fitted into them; consequently, they were unable to bear the weight of the roof, tottering under it, as it were, in a very threatening manner. This defect has been remedied by building a firm, well-drained, brick foundation upon which new oaken sills rest, grooved as before to receive the timbers, the unsound parts of which having been previously cut off, the effect produced is the same as before, except that the beams or trees are, almost imperceptibly, shortened. The plates, sills, and wood-work of the roof are new; but from the old ones being of a much more recent date than the rest of the building, no innovation has been made in that respect, as the chief objects of curiosity are still preserved unaltered. A handsome oak porch supplies the place of the former one, which was also of a more recent construction, and though elegant does not deprive the structure of its characteristic simplicity, to retain which in its original form every effort has been made, even down to replacing the old tiles on the roof. Within, the Church will be equally in keeping with the exterior when finished. The timbers will now appear inside as well as out; hitherto they were covered, or rather disfigured, with a thick coating of plaster and whitewash. The remaining improvements consist of another window, now making four in all, two on each side, filled with beautiful stained glass in lieu of the plain which formerly cumbered them, and of a round window in the west end, containing the head of St. Edmund, in stained glass, which was accidentally discovered a few years ago."

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

On Monday the Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel in Buckingham Palace. The Honourable and Rev. Leslie Courtenay Related. The Royal dinner party included the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Parma, the Chevalier Bunsen and Madame Bunsen, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marquis and Marchioness of Ormonde, Lord Clarence Paget, Lady in Waiting on the Hereditary Princess of Parma, Lord and Lady Palmerston, and Lord and Lady Charles Wellesley.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance at Drury-Lane Theatre with their presence on Saturday evening.

Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Seymour, inspected, on Saturday, the manufactory of tessalated pavements, at Messrs. Minton and Co.'s, in Albion-place, Blackfriars. His Royal Highness was conducted over the establishment by the members of the firm, and was pleased to express his gratification with the manufacture of encaustic tiles and pavements.

BIRTHDAY OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.—Saturday was the birthday of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. Some of the foreign Ministers and many of the nobility and gentry left their names at his Royal Highness during the day, at Cambridge House. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester received their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary at dinner, at Gloucester House.

PRINCE ALBERT AT THE ROYAL SOCIETY

On Monday, by the especial desire of Prince Albert, Dr. Faraday delivered a discourse at the Royal Society, on the diamagnetic and magne-crystallic condition of bodies. The lecture-room was crowded in every part. There were a considerable number of lady visitors present, amongst whom were Miss Burdett Coutts, Lady Holland, Mrs. Marcet, &c.

His Royal Highness, who was attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Seymour and the Hon. Colonel C. B. Phipps, entered the lecture room at three o'clock, and having been conducted to the chair, Dr. Faraday commenced the subject of his lecture by exhibiting the manner in which a piece of iron acts on the magnetic needle, and contrasting it with the total absence of all influence upon it displayed by copper and glass; yet he asserted like as not very that inert as these bodies seemed in these experiments, he would demonstrate that they, and every other substance in nature, were capable of being influenced by the magnetic fluid. In further showing experimentally the distinction between magnetic and what is called non-magnetic metals, he exhibited a spark of the late ly-popularised voltaic light, the intense illumination from which, in spite of the conflicting daylight, made itself distinctly apparent in the most remote portions of the apartment. He then proceeded to explain in familiar language the construction and the powers of the great electro-magnet with which the room is furnished, and the numerous appliances by which its power is brought to bear upon the different substances submitted to its influences, and he solicited particular attention to the singular state of the space lying between the poles of the magnet, or what is termed the magnetic field. Having suspended a piece of copper in the magnetic field, he demonstrated that no influence was exercised on it, the mass spinning round freely; but upon the circulation of the electric current round the magnet it immediately became stationary. A flattened piece of copper brought into contact with the magnet moved freely to and fro; but when the magnetic power was put on, great resistance was offered to its movement. After explaining, with the aid of a diagram, the direction of the lines of magnetic force, he showed that glass, paper, bismuth, water, &c., when submitted to the action of the magnetic power, came to rest in a line parallel or transverse to the ordinary line of magnetic force. These were called the diamagnetic bodies, and all substances, not merely inorganic or amorphous, but organic also, if not magnetic, were dia-magnetic. A piece of apple and a fish having been suspended in the magnetic field, were shown to be dia-magnetic bodies, coming to rest in a line transverse to the magnetic axis. The power of the magnetic current over flame, and its influence was next shown, by means of very ingeniously arranged machinery.

Having experimentally illustrated and illustrated the law that all bodies are either attracted to the poles, are and magnetic, or are repelled and are dia-magnetic, as in bismuth, &c., he proceeded to investigate the extraordinary kind of polarity exhibited by crystals of bismuth. He showed that a group of symmetric crystals of bismuth, suspended in the magnetic field between horizontal poles, would obtain a certain position in the same way as a magnetic needle when suspended, so that the horizontal line of transverse in the magnetic axis, becomes the vertical line, the crystal points with the greatest amount of force; but when placed so that the line parallel to the magnetic axis becomes vertical, all directive force is lost. The line of direction he called the magne-crystallic axis, and it is perpendicular to the most perfect of the planes of the crystal. Whether this axis is parallel or transverse to the magnetic pole, the bismuth in both cases presents the minimum of repulsion that is the same. It was shown that a crystal of sulphate of iron could be made to recede from the magnet under the influence of the magne-crystallic force, which tended to make the magnetic and magne-crystallic axis parallel. A crystal of bismuth being employed, that body was made to approach the magnetic pole, under the influence of the magne-crystallic force; from which facts he deduced the conclusion that it is neither attraction nor repulsion which determines the position of the set of a magne-crystall body, and that the force was in a great measure dependent on the crystalline condition of the body itself. The discovery was the peculiar power in nature for determining the set of bodies was very recent, but they hoped, ere long, to discover the whole truth. A great discovery in natural sciences, whose results the most powerful imagination could not anticipate, was even then looming before them; and the interest which had been manifested in their pursuits by the presence of his Royal Highness on that occasion would form an additional incentive to persevere in those paths of investigation which, in all probability, would ultimately conduct to a successful issue.

On the termination of the address, his Royal Highness approached the lecturer's table, and himself performed, under the superintendence of Dr. Faraday, several of the experiments which had been exhibited.

The Prince retired amid the loud applause of all present.

THE ORDER OF THE BATH.

The Queen held an investiture of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath on Saturday afternoon at Buckingham Palace.

At the last two orders, the Knights Grand Crosses of the Order assembled, and having been robed in their mantles of crimson satin, and wearing their collars, passed through the Picture Gallery to the Green Drawing-room, where they were called over by Bath King of Arms.

The officers of the order attended with their mantles, chains, and badges.

The Queen wore the mantle and collar of the Bath, and was conducted to the Throne Room (where the investiture took place) by the Lord Steward and also by the Lord Steward. Her Majesty was accompanied by Field-Marshal his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, Great Master of the Order, who also wore the mantle and collar of the Bath.

The Queen being seated in a chair of State, Prince Albert being by her side, and the Ladies in Waiting, the Great Officers of State, and the Noblemen and Gentlemen in Waiting occupying their usual stations near the Sovereign, the honours and Crosses were introduced to the Royal presence, attended by the Officers of the Order.

The Knights ranged themselves on each side of the Queen, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge being on the right of her Majesty, and his Grace the Duke of Wellington, the Senior Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, on the left.

Her Majesty's Honourable Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms lined the room.

The following were the parties honoured with the investiture:—Lieutenant-General Sir James Lillyman Caldwell, of the East India Company's service. Mr. George Russell Clerk, late Governor of Bombay, had the honour of Knighthood conferred upon him by the Queen, and was invested as a Civil Knight Commander. Mr. Henry Light, late Governor of Prince of Wales's Island, had the honour of Knighthood, and was invested as a Civil Knight Commander. Major-General Archibald Galloway, of the East India Company's service, had the honour of Knighthood conferred upon him, and was invested with the insignia of a Knight Commander. Colonel Duncan M'Gregor received the honour of Knighthood and the insignia of a Knight Commander. Colonel Charles Rowan was knighted, and was also invested with the insigna of a Knight Commander.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVÉE.

On Wednesday afternoon the Queen held a Levee (the second this season) in St. James's Palace.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived from Buckingham Palace shortly before two o'clock, attended by the Duchess of Norfolk and Lady Portman, Ladies in Waiting; Lord Canroys, Lord in Waiting; Lord George Lennox, Lord in Waiting to Prince Albert, &c.

At St. James's Palace her Majesty and his Royal Highness were received by the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Groom of the Stole to the Prince.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge was present at the Levee, attended by Major Baron Knesebeck, Equerry in Waiting. His Royal Highness the Hereditary Prince of Parma also attended the Levee [illegible] and Prince Albert having entered the Throne-room, the Levee [illegible] the introduction of the foreign diplomatic circle, when several [illegible] Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince Albert [illegible].

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

FUNERAL SERVICE AT THE MADELEINE.

of the Madeleine was duly behung with black cloths, studded with white stars and tears, and exhibiting an inscription to the "Citoyens morts pour la République." And certainly, if the imposing effect of a funeral ceremony was absent, the dullness of a day of mourning was fully attained, and "fallen glory" was well typified in the faded and dirty appearance of the sickly-looking decorations. Perhaps it was the consciousness that distance was necessary for the true stage effect of the ensemble, which had caused a double row of soldiers to be placed upon the pavement of the procession, at such intervals between each rank that the public was driven back so far as not to be able to look either upon the actors in the drama, or the scenery, too near. Under the "tyrant," upon similar ceremonial occasions, the piéds had never been so rigorously "kept at a distance." It must be owned, however, that the house was not full, or rather that "the affluence of spectators" (as French theatrical reports have it) was not so considerable as to render it worth the while to do the thing in grand style. The enclosure was but a compact one; and when at last the procession made its appearance, headed by a squadron of dragoons with [illegible] pistols in hand, and guarded on each side of the Madeleine, the rows of [illegible] were perfectly angelic in their character [illegible] to say, as far as, like "angels' visits," they were few, and far between—except from bearded men, with wild dirty faces of the true republican type, who seemed to have been posted for the purpose of simulating a people's enthusiasm. Once more, no more nor less than "under the tyrant," when the same salvoes were shouted "Vive la République!" and from a still fewer number of the National Guards, not a "Vive!" was to be heard. On one spot stood a group of artizans en blouse. "Tiens!" said one; "now they are going to sing a funeral mass; suppose they were to bury the Republic!" "Requiescat in pace!" responded another, with a sneer characteristic of a certain class, and then the fellows all set up singing a "De profundis." Shortly afterwards they went off with the new favourite air, imitating the [illegible] oaks and gestures of the actors in the well-known scene. In spite of the lukewarmness of the enthusiasm, however, some wicked reactionary people said "because of it," the procession of the representatives did its duty manfully, and tried to be as imposing as might be. The cortége of gentes voiturés de remise and fiacres, which contained the members of the Council of State, was certainly not very effective any more than that of similar vehicles with the members of the law courts, faculties, &c., in their red robes. But then, Marrast, with his moustache new blackened for the occasion, made up for that, by marching, as President of the Assembly, at the head of his flock, with martial step, and hand placed imposingly upon his hip. And the tri-colour scarfs and badges of the representatives were grand enough in the mass. And the "Montagne," which affected to come last, as the oppressed children and "injured innocents" of the representative family, shouted and screamed out of the Assembly with as much energy as they daily shout and scream in it; with Lagrange flourishing about his arms on high, with frantic theatrical gesture, at their head; and made noise enough to supply, in themselves alone, all the lack of enthusiasm in the "vile reactionary bourgeois crowd," at least, fully to overpower the effect of the silence, and, certainly, to give some importance to the procession. The President of the Republic arrived by the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, with a brilliant staff of carriages, in which were the Ministers and his suite, with a dragoon masking each window of that in which he sat. The mass was speedily "got over." In an incredibly short space of time, the notabilities poured out of the church; President, Representatives, corps de l'état, &c., departed as they had come, in carriages or on foot. Excepting the strong posts of military, in all directions, the streets were being shortly left to the wandering crowds of Parisians, who are glad of every occasion for making a holiday; and who, on this, had nothing to do but to walk about and look the appearances of a fête, which nowhere could be found. The elevated tripods and the big candelabra still puffed forth their noisome smoke; but the business of the day, as regarded the anniversary of the "glorious days" of February, 1848, was over. Not so, however, in the significance which might be attached to popular demonstrations by an observer. Citizens had been requested ("invités") by official programme to celebrate the anniversary by a spontaneous illumination. But, alas! the days when screeching men and boys paraded the streets howling "Des lampions!" and threatening the breakage of windows to the reluctant—the days of the spontaneous illuminations of fear—were gone by! Along the whole vista of the Boulevard, as far as the Porte St. Martin, not two dozen lampions were to be seen at patriotic windows; and these sad twinklers in the general gloom looked as if they had been placed purposely as an irony of enthusiasm! Even revolutionary gamins laughed and stamped the anniversary-day in their future nomenclature as the "fête aux trois lampions." So much for the enthusiasm of the citizens of Paris in favour of the Republic—so much for the brilliancy of the spontaneous illumination by which they were requested to hail it!

DEPOSITION OF CROWNS OF IMMORTELLES AT THE FOOT OF THE JULY COLUMN.

By a strange coincidence, and as if to celebrate the anniversary of the establishment of the Republic with still stronger marks of irony, the prisoners of Vincennes—the heroes of the Republic de la veille—the conspirators who helped to effect the revolution which had a Republic of their choice for its result—Messrs. Barbès, Blanqui, Albert, and Co., were dispatched off to Bourges for trial on the 25th, without exciting comment or remark, or the smallest demonstration. Their feelings must have contrasted strangely with those of their first triumph on the same day one little year before.

The clamours, the shouts of triumph, and the calls for fraternising demonstrations, in the ultra-democratic Journals, respecting the establishment of an Italian Republic in Rome and Florence, have forced the consideration of foreign affairs more upon the Parisian public than at first, but only to express a strong sentiment against the Italian revolutionary movement, and to prove their indignation at the treatment which the Pope receives in those Journals.

The President of the Republic is often to be seen in public, and is said to be fishing for "golden opinions" from all sorts of men, by visiting the faubourgs, and entering the houses of the poor—of course, people declare, with an ulterior political intent. On Monday evening he appeared, with his suite, at the ex-Théâtre Français, in the ex-Royal box. One of the pieces performed, a new comedy, called "L'Amitié des Femmes," contained several satirical allusions unfavourable to the Republic. At first the President laughed and applauded with the public. On a sudden, however, whether of his own accord, or warned by one of his suite, he seemed to think he was compromising his position by listening to such "reactionary" and anti-republican hits. Every eye was turned upon him as each allusion grew stronger and stronger, to examine their effect upon his physiognomy. He got up and hurriedly left his box.

SPELTHORNE CLUB COURSING MEETING HAMPTON COURT PARK.

THE SPELTHORNE COURSING CLUB.

We this week present our readers with a View in the Home Park at Hampton Court, representing the members of the Club preparing to contend for their annual prizes of a Cup and Goblet. The Club in question is of long standing, and takes its name from the Hundreds within which its operations are principally confined: it was, if we mistake not, originated by the Messrs. Farnell, through whose persevering exertions it has been not only kept alive, but brought to its present prosperous condition.

It consists of between twenty and thirty members, many of whom are content with striving for the honour of winning the Puppy Cup, in November, and the more important prize for all ages, in February. a few, however, are more ambitious, and occasionally venture into "distant hunting-grounds" in search o coursing laurels, and their names may be found in the Wiltshire, Newmarket and Cardigan meetings; but, altogether, the Club is more select than numerous, and eminently distinguished for good-fellowship and a sportsmanlike feeling; they are happy, too, in possessing a most indefatigable and business-like secretary, in the person of Mr. H Farnell

The Club mustered in great force on Wednesday, the 21st of February, when an entry of 16 clippers was made for the Cup; and an eight and two four dog stakes were immediately filled. The morning was lovely, and, for so quiet a meeting, there was a more than usual display of company; and at eleven precisely, after a pithy and very proper address to some of the lookers-on, from Mr. Parsons, who is truly indefatigable on behalf of the Club, the first brace of dogs were put into the slips.

Although there is rarely any betting among the members, it was whispered that the chief favourite was Mr Bertie's Astræa, who, from her performance at preliminaries, was considered the most dangerous opponent. Mr. Parkinson's Sable was fancied by some; nor were Ashdown and Jack Abel without their admirers, the latter having won the Puppy Cup in November. Messrs. Furnell's team were certainly "dark," and they constantly bring out so many which are "Famous," "Fearless," and "Faultless," that the uninitiated are somewhat in the dark too, however, upon this occasion, their lot was a strong one, three being left in to divide the honours of the Cup and Goblet between them.

There was an interesting course between Stockton and Firebrand, the latter, contrary to the strong opinion of the knowing ones, was very nearly extinguished; he honesty, however, in a fair course pulled through. Astræa and Sable were well matched; the latter had two falls, or the result might possibly have been different; as it was, Astræa was a handsome winner. Mr. Ingram's two were defeated, nor must it be wondered at, if he gives them another dose of running as he appears to have done only a day or so before the meeting. Ashdown beat Peterloo with perfect ease. Bantam and Fair Maid had a good course, which appeared to the spectators to be in favour of the former; but there was some work done afterwards, and if we may judge from the rest of Mr. Lawrence's decisions throughout the meeting, there is no reason to suppose he was incorrect in this instance. Thus ended round the first for the Cup.

The Spelthorne Stakes came next, and there was a good and closely-contested course between Fiatcatcher and Manxmilla; the other was all hollow in favour of the respective winners.

Bessy Bedlam won the Puppy Stakes with great ease.

The first ties for the Cup were unfortunate, inasmuch as there were two "no course," in each of which Astræa and Ashdown got a gratuitous spin, in consequence of their opponents having been unsighted. The scarcity of hares at the finish rendered it necessary to postpone their courses until the following week; and certainly no day ever turned out more boisterous and uncomfortable than Wednesday the 28th, when the Club re-assembled to conclude the sports of the meeting.

We will give the Cup precedence without following the regular order of running for the other stakes; and it will be sufficient to say that Astræa was obliged to succumb to Mr. Farnell's pair Maid, after a fair run up and a moderate quantity of work; much, we think, to the loss and annoyance of some of the "locals," by whom Astræa was considered invincible. Ashdown beat Firebrand easily, but was in turn very cleverly put out by Fearless in the longest course of the meeting, in which the bitch showed to great advantage

In the Spelthorne Stakes, Flatcatcher had it all his own way with Fanboy.

Manxmilla beat Pen Pusher (late Acorn) without the latter making a point; Playmate was equally severe upon Bessy Bedlam, but was in turn handsomely defeated by Manxmilla, who won the stakes

In the Norfolk Stakes, Freemason and Sable won their respective courses with perfect ease

From the boisterous state of the weather, it was not possible to run off the Ladies' Stakes, but the knowing ones were taken in by Brandy-face giving Jack Abel a good dressing, and thus proving himself to be a thorough good greyhound; and, but for the wretched state of the weather on the last day, the meeting would have been every thing the most fastidious courser could desire; all, however, winners and losers, returned to their homes in high good-humour, well satisfied with the sport, and without grumbling at the decisions of the judge, which cannot be said for every meeting of much higher pretensions even than the Spelthorne

We have not space to give the names of all the dogs that ran, but must content ourselves with giving the names of the winners:

The Cup and Goblet. -Won by Mr. Farnell's Fearless, by Fantail, out of his Blue Bess.

The Spelthorne Stakes.—Won by Mr Bright's Feeler.

The Puppy Stakes. Won by Mr. Bird's Bessy Bedlam.

The Victoria Stakes.—Won by Mr. Meyrick's Manzanilla.

The Norfolk Stakes.—Won by Mr Parkinson's black b. Sable

COUNTRY NEWS.

VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF ORANGE TO LIVERPOOL.—On Tuesday afternoon his Royal Highness the Prince of Orange-Nassau (son of the King of the Netherlands) arrived at the Adelphi Hotel, Liverpool, accompanied by Admiral Arnhem, Sir Henry Ainsworth, Bart, and Colonel Calder, who formed his suite. His Royal Highness and party were entertained at dinner at the Town Hall, the same night, by the Mayor, whose carriage attended at the Adelphi to convey his Royal Highness to the Town-Hall. Amongst the guests present who had been invited by his Worship to meet his Royal Highness and his suite, were the Earl of Yarborough, the Hon. C. W. G. Howard, the Hon. Col. Lowther, J. Willmck, Esq. (Dutch Consul), J. Marshal, Esq., Mayor of Stockport; Major-General Sir William Warre, &c. The Mayor, it was understood, was to have the honour of conferring on his Royal Highness and suite the freedom of the borough at Antrem, on Wednesday.

HOUSES OF RED-LETTER HOUSES.—A clergyman, not long since, called at a house in his parish, near Uxbridge, Leicestershire, which he set out as "lodgings for travellers," and in the room was a map of the country, with the principal houses inserted, underneath which was written, "The red lines denote the inhabitants that give, the black do not." His own was underlined with the former, which has altered to black, and the diminished number of calls was most marked

THE RAILWAY ROBBERY.—Last week some additional facts which had transpired with respect to this audacious robbery were communicated to the Post Office authorities, and it is said there is good reason to bel eve that a vast amount of the property has been recovered. It is discovered As soon as Poole's friends heard of the new discoveries, they gave orders to Mr. Fraser, the pawnbroker, of Euston, to sell the watch of the prisoner's property. The house occupied Tuesday and Wednesday (last week), and was held in the name in which Poole lived, and which was most superbly furnished. The auctioneer, in opening the sale, truly remarked that the furniture was fit for the mansion of any nobleman. The lots were finished in very high price, consisted chiefly of plate and plated goods, magnificent mahogany and rosewood sideboards, chiffoniers, bedsteads, spendid feather beds, Brussels and Turkey carpets, linen, china, &c. So great was the desire to purchase the sale, that the catalogues, which gave the right of admission, sold at high prices.

SOUTH FORELAND.—SHIPPING SIGNAL.—We lately announced that preparations were making, under the Trinity Board, for the erection of Wells' Patent Railway and Shipping Signal, at the South Foreland Lighthouse, as a warning to vessels to stand from the shore in dense foggy weather, when the lights are invisible. The machine is portable, and consists of a cylinder fitted with piston rod, fly and cog-wheels, and handle for raising the piston, by which air is instantly generated and expelled, the sound being given off by the turning of the handle. Last week the above machine was tried at the Foreland in a thick fog, to ascertain the best spot to place it before it was finally fixed for best its power, a party went out in the coast-guard boat, as far as the South Sand Head Light-ship, about four miles from the shore, but being considered a sufficient distance for the sound to be heard. The party went on board the light-ship, the signal was given to sound the cylinder whistle, and, on the apparatus being set in work, the sound was distinctly heard, and elicited a burst of applause from the crew.

EXTRAORDINARY BEQUESTS.—The following is an authentic, and, we believe, a correct statement of the munificent bequests for charitable purposes lately left by Mrs. Mary Tucker, of Bramptord Speke, in the county of Devon. We may, perhaps, mention, that the objects of charity have been principally, if not entirely, selected at the suggestion of Sir R. Inglis:—, for repairs and alterations in Brampford Speke Church, in Devonshire, £1000 stock; 2, Barnstaple Infirmary, £60; 3, Barnstaple parish, 50l; 4, Brampford parish, Devonshire, £1,471,13 paupers), and 41.8 in 1848 (1,026,501 paupers); and the rate of the total expenditure on the population of 1841 amounted to 9s. 9¼d. per head in 1847, against 7s. 10¼d in 1848; these exhibit an increase of 2s. 11¾d. per head the latter year of is. 1½d. per h . The total expenditure for the relief of the poor amounted in 1847 to £4,079,110; and in 1848, to £5,435,973; showing a difference against the latter year of £1,356,863. Of the sum of £5,435,973 expended in 1848, the sum of £955,700 was appropriated to in-door maintenance; £3,330,316 to out-door relief; £66,036 to establishment and salaries; £6,501 to workhouse loans repaid; and £5976 to other charges connected with the relief of the poor

The total expenditure for the relief of the poor in England and Wales, as shown by the annual poor-rate returns, received from the clerks to the guardians and overseers of the poor, exhibit an increase in 1848, as compared with 1847, of £881,973, or nearly 20 per cent.

The Commissioners attribute this large increase to the general depression which existed in the manufacturing districts, and to the influx of paupers from Ireland in a state of destitution -an evil which would seem to require immediate remedy.

Immediately after the constitution of the Board, the ex-Assistant Commissioners were appointed Inspectors, under the 10th and 11th Victoria, CAP. 109. The present number of these inspectors is th rteen.

The Commissioners very seriously animadvert upon the subject of vaccinancy. The late President, Mr. Butler, devoted much consideration to the question, and collected a large mass of information from various quarters. A minute, prepared by that gentleman, was in consequence issued to boards of guardians, urging the necessity of repressing the growing evil, and exercising greater vigilance and discrimination in the administration of relief to vaccrants. It is not to form a conclusion as to the general effect of this minute in repressing the evil. The subject will continue to occupy the attentions of the Board.

The Board reports its determination to dispense with the issuing of orders for sanctioning changes in the dietaries of workhouses.

The emigration of paupers under the sanction of the Board was much increased during the past year. The number of persons, and the total amount of emigration at the cost of the poor-rates very much surpassed the average of former years

As regards the removal of paupers, it is reported, that although the change introduced by the Act of 1846 produced considerable disturbance in the charges for the relief of the poor in many parishes, the temporary Act of 10th and 11th Victoria, chap. 110, removed much of the cause of complaint and dissatisfaction.

The law of settlement is the next topic touched upon by the Board. An inquiry is pending, the Commissioners having appointed five gentlemen to make a careful local investigation of the subject in the agricultural districts, reducing the whole subject of the operation of the law of settlement and the removal of the poor. Those gentlemen entered on the inquiry last April, and from time to time reports have already been received.

The Act 11th and 12th Victoria, chap 31, prepared by Mr. Baines, M.P. for Kingston-on-Hull (to amend the procedure in respect of orders of removal and appeals), is declared to be a boon of great practical utility.

The Board has been actively employed since last session in co-operating with the Board of Health and the Guardians of unions for the removal of nuisances and the prevention of contagious diseases.

Thus concludes the Report, which is dated from Somerset-house, the 30th day of December, 1848.

THE IRISH FRANCHISE.—Sir William Somerville and Sir George Grey have prepared and brought in a bill, entitled "A Bill to amend the Laws which regulate the Qualification and Registration of Parliamentary Voters in Ireland." The bill contains no less than 119 clauses, with forms and schedules attached. The main provisions of the act are, that, after the 30th day of November, occupiers of land, rated for the poor-rate at a net annual value of £8 and upwards, and being duly registered, according to law, may be entitled to vote at elections in counties. Persons entitled to estates in fee or in tail, of the annual value of £5, are likewise entitled to vote in counties. A similar qualification will entitle the occupier to vote for cities or boroughs. An occupancy of twelve calendar months, before the 16th of July in each year, is necessary, and no person can be registered who shall not have resided within the county in respect of the premises which shall have become payable previously to the 5th of January then next preceding. The Government have also introduced another measure, to shorten the duration of elections in Ireland, and to establish additional polling-places. The bill provides, that, from and after the 30th of next November, contested elections in counties shall only last two days; that the two days are to be consecutive, and that the poll as only to be open seven hours on the first day, and eight hours on the second day—viz. from eight A.M. till four P.M. The state of the poll is to be declared on the following day, between the hours of seven and two o'clock. Convenient cantonel polling-places are to be established in counties, and no booth is to contain more than three hundred persons In cities and boroughs, the booths for freemen are to be kept separate from the others, and all are to be numbered alphabetically.

THE THEATRES.

OPERA COMIQUE, ST. JAMES'S.

On Monday night, Gretry's opera of "Richard Cœur de Lion" was presented in its integrity, the score need being that of the Opéra Comique, in Paris, on its revival in 1841, when it ran nearly 200 nights. Adolphe Adam having supplied the additional accompaniments rendered necessary by the modern discoveries in orchestral resources. Every lover of art will be grateful to Mr. Mitchell for mounting this interesting and valuable musical work. We are only regret that his vocal forces were not qualified to do it as much justice as was done by his compact and excellent little orchestra, conducted by Haussens. To hear [illegible] with not a single singer in the cast competent to sing the music, was indeed vexatious in the highest degree; but it is useless to disguise the fact—the vocalization, from first to last, was a complete massacre of Gretry's exquisite melodies. On the other hand, if such a cast could have saved even an opera, that of Coudere, in Blondel, the minstrel, was inimitable; and the by-play of Mdlle. Guichard, in the part of the boy Antonio, was also clever. But here all praise must cease: in the whole world's history there never could have been a greater parody on Cœur de Lion than Bonnamy. The Laurette of Mdlle. Charton, both vocally and histrionically, was quite a misconception; and of the other characters it would be needless to speak.

There must be no mistake about this matter, for Gretry's fame is an illustration of art progress, and it must not be sacrificed to the shame of insuperable interpreters. One body of amateurs, who had heard this opera in Paris (with Roger, Massot, Henri, Grignon, Sainte Foy, and Rignier, Anna Thillon, Mdlle. Rosemond, and the Mdlles. Meyers), declared that Mdlle Grisy-artaben, and despite the artistes cheered every de licious motif; but those amateurs who were unacquainted with Gretry, and heard him for the first time, ascribed to him the misdeeds of his interpreters.

It may be asked "Who was Gretry?" by some anti Gallicans, for the French school and its real merits are only beginning to be properly appreciated in this country. Gretry, born at Liege in 1741, and who died in 1813, was the composer of some sixty operas, many of which have enjoyed a permanent popularity in France. In fact, until Cherubini in Paris, and Mozart in Germany, revolutionised the operatic world by the union of science and effect," that is, by enriching scores with the resources of instrumental colouring, Gretry's genius was supreme for spontaneity and grace of melody. Gretry was never a convert to the modern system, he was for simplicity, and opposed to learning and counterpoint. His reply to Napoleon, who asked him once his opinion of Cimarosa and Mozart, was characteristic of his contempt for scientral writing. "Cimarosa," he said, "places his statue on the stage, and the pedestal in the orchestra, whilst Mozart, on the contrary, places his statue in the orchestra, and the pedestal on the stage."

In Gretry's own language is depicted his music: it is essentially melodic and chantant, quaint and forcible, deriving all its charms from the effects to be produced by pure melody only. The opening chorus of peasants, "Chantons, chantons," is as pretty a pastoral picture as can be conceived. The air of Antonio, "La danse n'est-ce pas ce que j'aime," is same. The famed air of "O Richard! O mon Roi!" which, in the first French revolution, in 1793, caused a thousand swords to leap from their scabbards to defend the outraged Marie Antoinette, has become European; even Coudere's shouting could not destroy its sentiment, and the encore was irresistible from every part of the house. As for the duo between Blondel and Laurette, "Un bandeau couvre les yeux," there is nothing more elegant and effective in the entire range of theatric lore. The finale of the first act, in which Blondel has discovered the King's prison, is very inventive: in the melody will be recognised the "Harmonious blacksmith" of Handel, who took it from the same source as Gretry—an old Provençal air. Tolbecque played the viola accompaniment in this air excellently. It is supposed to be played by Blondel, as the blind minstrel; and Coudere's feeling of it was beyond all praise

A lovely melody is the plaint of Richard in his dungeon, "Si l'univers entier m'oublie," opening the second act; but the romance, "Une fièvre conlante," sung by Blondel to awaken the King's attention, is the gem of the opera. For passionate intensity it is unequalled, and when Richard joins in the refrain, with the crescendo of the orchestra, it is overwhelming in its effect. The drama culminates at Half-past eleven, when Richard at the bars of his prison above, on a raised terrace, whilst Blondel is singing in the ditch of the fortress, the third act, in which the governor of the fortress is enticed from his post by a masked ball, and Richard and Blondel with the peasants attack the fort, and rescue the King, is chiefly filled with energetic concerted pieces.

HAYMARKET.

The houses here continue to be very good, and on Monday Mr. James Wallack appeared as Othello, admirably supported by Mr. Charles Kean as Iago, Miss Cushman as Desdemona, and Mrs. Charles Kean as Emilia. The performances altogether were as perfect as could be desired; and the various "points" incidents, to the acknowledged readings of the parts were admirably brought out and drew down thunders of applause. At the same time, we would rather see Mr. Wallack in such parts as Don Cæsar de Bazan, and such dramas as the "Rent Day." He is one of our greatest actors, and, in certain characters, places it much above all competitors; while the usual run of leading heroic parts, he does not in any way stand out from the circle of actors in those lines about him.

SADLER'S WELLS.

An [illegible] of those revivals of the works of the old dramatists, for which this theatre has become celebrated, took place on Wednesday evening, when the "Honest Man's Fortune" was produced, the joint production of Beaumont and Fletcher. We may recal the plot briefly:—"The honest man" is the Lord of Montague. He and the Duke of Orleans are at law about the estate of the former: the Duke gains it cases by means of forged documents performing the hungry Lazarillo. We have not seen so clever a piece of acting for some time. His alternations of hope and despair, as the coveted umbrrano's head was almost within, or snatched away from, his grasp, were ludicrously delicious; and his portunacity in the pursuit, and final interview with Julia, kept the house in roars of laughter. Mrs. Sterling was as graceful an Orsina as could well be found, and spoke the epilogue, which had been written for the occasion, most charmingly. Mr. Stuart's Gondarino was well conceived through out; and Mr. Sterling's Pandaro carefully acted. Mr Lewis Murray had comparatively little to do; but it is needless to say that it was well done. Miss Mandibert, whom we have before had occasion to notice, spoke her lines, as the Boy, clearly and sensibly.

The comedy has been nicely mounted by Mr. Davidson, and the dresses are all very good taste. Its reception was most favourable, and the prize pal performers had to appear.

THE BATH AND BRISTOL AMATEURS.

The performances of this troupe came to a brilliant termination at the Bath Theatre, on Saturday evening, when "Used Up," "A Day well spent," and "The Captain of the Watch," were represented to an audience that filled every corner of the house, and comprised all the principal residents at Bath, as well as the "fashionable arrivals" of the season.

The same performances were given at Bristol on the preceding evening, with great effect; but the Bath night was the one, par excellence.

MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Never has the choral grandeur of the immortal Handel been so wonderfully developed as in the performance of "Israel in Egypt," under Costa's direction. This oratorio, given in its integrity, without the interpolations of any musical meddler, and additional accompaniments by Costa being added but in rare instances, may be stated to have been heard for the first time. The vocalists to whom the task was allotted of singing the principal parts were Miss Birch, Miss I. Pyne, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Machin, and Mr. Phillips. In the first part the solo singing is confined to the simple recitative of the tenor. "Now there arose a new King," which opens the oratorio—an example which is followed by Mendelssohn, in the Elijah, only that the latter follows his recitative with an overture; the second recitative of the tenor, "Then saw he Moses," and the air for the contralto, "Their land brought forth frogs." Then come in succession eleven stupendous choruses, comprising the historical narrative of the maiden of Moses, and the attendant miracles in the deliverance of the Israelites from the land of bondage. It was quite marvellous to listen to the fine precision and unity of effect with which the multitudinous phalanx of choral and instrumental forces executed these choral pictures The descriptive under-current of instrumentation, which Handel has carried on in the midst of the most complex choral bursts of sound, was rendered as vivid and animated as if the executants were playing a symphony without the intervention of vocal combinations. The delivery of "He spake the word" was most imposing. The crescendo in the beginning of the "He gave them hailstones" was a masterly management of the gradations of tone. The effect of this chorus was overwhelming, melting to tears many of the listeners, and exciting others to loud exclamations for the encore, setting aside all regulations to the contrary. The effect of "He sent a thick darkness" was marred by the voices getting out of pitch; but in the next chorus, "He smote all the first-born," all was right again. The pastoral movement, "He led them forth like sheep," was charmingly done. The "Overwhelming of the waters," and the passage, "There was not one of them left," were positively sublime. "The horse and his rider" created another encore, to electrified was the assemblage. This due for two basses, "The Lord is a man of war," was also demanded twice. In the chorus, "They sank into the bottom as a stone," the effect was superb—the holding note on the word "stone" was finely conceived. Mendelssohn's organ accompaniment was chiefly used throughout the overture, except in the passages for the mixed stops. "Thy right hand, O Lord!" was gloriously delivered—a wondrous emanation of massive harmonies it is, as is the "And with the blast," the expression in the word "congealed" being well delivered. The reading of the air, "Thou didst blow," was poetical, and it was nicely sung by Miss Birch, who had the tyrine "Sing ye to the Lord." "Sing ye, for thou shalt bring them in," was sung with the luscious tones of Miss Dolby; but it required a little more animation to be effective.

On Thursday night the second performance was honoured with the presence of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The gallery to the left of the hall, looking at the orchestra, was fitted up for the occasion. The Prince was received with several bursts of cheering, and the same loyal displays were repeated at the close of the oratorio. Seeing the Duke of Wellington in the reserved seats in the body of the Hall, the Prince sent to his Grace to join him in the Royal Box. The oratorio was magnificent—all the little defects on the first occasion were remedied, and it was a perfect performance. The "Hailstone Chorus" was encored with one voice, and Miss Dolby was compelled to repeat her air. "Israel in Egypt" will be given for the third time, on the 8th instant. Such an execution of Handel's masterpiece is an honour to our musical epoch, formless as it does a new era in the interpretation of the sacred works of the great masters.

MDLLE JENNY LIND.

On Monday evening Mdlle Lind sang at a concert at Shrewsbury, and on Tuesday morning at a concert in Chester. In both places money was refused for tickets, but the receipts for the two concerts exceeded 1200 guineas. There was no slightest abatement in the enthusiasm of her reception. The party consisted of Mdlle. Lind, Miss Kenneth, a very promising singer of Manchester, Signor Belletti; with Seymour (from Manchester) as leader, Mr. Hiles, organist at St—bury; with Benedict as conductor. On Thursday (March 1), Mdlle. Lind sang at Derby. Next Tuesday (the 6th) she will sing at Nottingham; on the 8th at Sheffield; and on the 10th at Cambridge. At Derby, Sheffield, Nottingham, and Sheffield, Signor F. Lablache is engaged, and at Cambridge, Signor Belletti Benedict conducts all these concerts

The pleasure in London will, however, be delighted to learn that Mdlle. Lind's talents are not to be confined to the provinces, but that she will sing at six grand concerts at Exeter Hall, which will be given in the months of March (after the Lenten concert) and April. It is intended to introduce, for the first time, Mdlle Lind in Handel's "Messiah" and Haydn's "Creation," and in some miscellaneous selections she will sing the same from the operas of the great German masters. At these concerts Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Whitworth, and the Misses Wilkins are already engaged; and an engagement has been offered to Mr. Staudigl, whose reply from Vienna is daily expected. Benedict will be the conductor of Mdlle. Lind's six concerts.

THE THALBERG-LABLACHE TOUR.—Mr. Beale's provincial musical tours are now not confined to the termination of the season in London, but are undertaken with the greatest spirit throughout the year. Lablache, who was engaged at Paris, in the Italian Opera-house, at the end of January, returned to that capital last Saturday, to reappear this week, but in the meanwhile he had sung at concerts at the following places, accompanied by his son signor Nicolin as baritone), Mdlle. Vera, Miss Sassoon, with Thalberg, his son-in-law, as pianiste, and Signor Vera as conductor:—Exeter Hall on the 29th of January (Beale's concert), Brighton the 30th, and Exeter the 31st. On the 1st of February at Plymouth, on the 2d at Bristol, on the 3d at Bath, on the 5th at Birmingham, 6th at Leamington, 7th at Northampton, 8th at Oxford, 9th at Cheltenham, 10th at Leamington, 12th at Newcastle-on-Tyne, 14th and 15th at Edinburgh, 16th at Glasgow, 19th at York, 17th at Hull, 20th at Derby and Nottingham (two concerts in one day), 20th at Sheffield, 22nd at Manchester, and on the 23rd at Liverpool. Lablache quitted the party at this latter place to return to Paris, to be present at the marriage of one of his daughters, and to resume his duties at the Italian Opera until the beginning of April. Thalberg, with the other singers, was to give concerts in Dublin on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of February. Considering the colossal size of the great Lablache, this is an extraordinary tour, but he sang at all the concerts with unabated flow of spirits.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.—Wallace's "Maritana" has been produced at Hamburgh with success; and in the same town Benedict's "Crusaders" has reached its fifteenth representation.—Mdlle. Antonia de Meudi, a cousin of Malibran and Pauline Viardot, has made a most successful début at the Italian Opera, in Brussels, as Semnaia, in the "Somnambula." She sang the two cavatinas, especially the largo of the finale, admirably. It will be you rejected that she created some sensation at concerts last season by singing Spanish airs with Madame Viardot.—Meyerbeer has composed an overture to his new opera of "The Prophète," the first representation of which is fixed for Thursday, the 8th of April. Madame Ugalde-Beaucé will not quit the Opéra Comique in Paris, the director having increased her salary.—Madame Persuni is singing at Brussels.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—The 111th anniversary festival will be celebrated at Freemasons' Hall, Thursday, March 22; the Earl of Cawdor in the chair. The Earl of Westmoreland, the British Minister at Berlin, has sent a donation of £5, with a kind letter, regretting his inability to attend. As usual, there will be a great musical treat. Harper will direct a band of wind instruments. Braham and Sims Reeves, Miss Dolby and Miss E. Lyon, will sing. T. Harper will play a solo on the trumpet; and Thalberg, if in town, will perform on the piano. Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Holmes, and Potter will accompany the singers. Glees and madrigals will be sung by a choir of upwards of one hundred voices. The committee of management is as follows—Messrs. Bennett, Barnett, Card, Coote, J. B. Chatterton, Cramer, Durrell, Griffin, Horsley, Harper, Hodgson, Hatton, Holmes, King, S. T. Jacobs, Macfarren, Mudie, Neate, Parry, Potter, Phillips, Rovedino, and Rodwell

MUSICAL EVENTS.—The fifth meeting of the Choral Harmonists will take place on Monday.—Mr. W. S. Bennett's second performance of classical pianoforte music will be given on Tuesday.—The first meeting of the Amateur Musical Society will take place on Wednesday. On Saturday (the 10th) will be the opening night of the Royal Italian Opera.—The Philharmonic season will commence on the 12th. the subscription is progressing satisfactorily.—The Round, Catch, and Canon Club met on Saturday last.—Mr. Francis in the chair. Lockey, Gear, Machin, Bradbury, King, Land, Hobbs, and Phillips were amongst the singers.—A testimonial has been presented to Mr. G. Perry, for many years the leader of the orchestra at the Sacred Harmonic Society.—Moschèles has left London for Leipsic.

In a recent lecture at Edinburgh, Mr. Bond pronounced the very worst localities in London elysiums compared with many of the closes of "Auld Reekie."

White wins

(a) An excellent move—relieving himself at once from the threatened danger to his Queen and opening a most formidable attack upon the adverse King

(b) Tremendous rush, and thus securing the loss of the exchange.

(c) Would have rendered an attempt to carry the war into the enemy's territory, by playing the Q to K R 8th, and K Kt to B 5th afterwards

(d) White now turns the assault upon his opponent, and the attack and counter-attack are especially sustained.

(e) It to Q 2nd would, perhaps, have been best

(f) This is exceedingly insidious, but it gives White too much time

(g) Losing moves. He should have played the Q to K 5th, when the following variation was pretty sure to win.

BLACK.	WHITE	BLACK.	WHITE
(g) Q to K 5th		(h) P to K R 5th	Q or K takes K P (ch)

28. K to R sq	Q to K 7th (ch)

(i) Again White must play the Kt to Q 3d or 6th, or else he will lose the game.

(k) P to Q 5th seems much more effective, and leads to many strange variations.

"MY PRETTY PAGE, LOOK OUT AFAR."—PAINTED BY A. ". WOOLMER.

Our first Illustration this week is Mr. Woolmer's interesting picture of "My Pretty Page, look out afar," a line from a ballad rendered very popular some years since by Mr. Bishop's beautiful music, to which the words were set. The picture affords a very favourable example of the class of art to which it belongs.

The second Illustration, Mr. Ansdell's "Successful Deer-stalkers," is the artist's most successful picture in the Exhibition.

We have the satisfaction to announce that the following Pictures are in the hands of our Engravers, and will appear in early Numbers:

Phillip's "Man from first to last requires assistance."
Le Jeune's "Ophelia."
Martin's "Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still," Lance's "Winter."
O'Neil's "St. Katherine and St. Cecilia."
Gilbert's "Death of a-Becket."
Danby's "Funeral of a High-and Chieftain."

Also, the fine group in marble, "Ino and the Infant Bacchus," by J. H. Foley.

There is, says the Liverpool Standard, at present to be seen in the Earl of Derby's estate at Knowsley, a considerable quantity o' gold dust imbedded in soil which has been brought from California along with some rare trees and plants.

NEW PRINTS.

PHARAOH'S CHARIOT HORSES

This celebrated picture, by Mr. J. F. Herring, exhibited at the British Institution of last year, and illustrated in our Journal, has just been engraved in the highest style of line and mezzotinto, by Mr. C. W. Wass. The plate, like the painting, is of circular form, twenty-four inches in diameter; it is executed with surprising effect, and the sem poetic character of the composition is perfectly maintained. The plate has been engraved for Mr. Gilbert, of Sheffield, the proprietor of the picture; and the impressions will be published under the superintendence of the Printsellers' Association, and delivered strictly in the order in which subscribers' names are received.

EVE OF THE BATTLE OF EDGE HILL. By C. Landseer, R.A.

This fine historical picture is now being exhibited, preparatory to its being engraved in the highest style of the art. The composition may be thus briefly described:—" King Charles I. is said to have taken refreshment, and to have slept, with the two Princes, at a cottage in Radway, between which place and Kinston was the field of battle. The principal group is intended to represent a Council of War, including portraits of King Charles I., the Earl of Lindesey, General Prince Rupert, who commanded the horse, Sir Jacob Astley, the Lord Bernard Stuart, and Sir Edmund Verney, who carried the King's standard. On the left are the two Princes, Charles and James."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

WIGMORE CASTLE, HEREFORDSHIRE.

This massive ruin is situate on a rocky eminence to the west of the town Wigmore, on the north side of the county of Hereford. The Castle was s rounded by a moat, the remains of which are now visible, and over which w a drawbridge. The fortress was built by Ethelfleda or Elfleda, the eldest daugh of the famous Saxon King, Alfred.

At the time of the Norman conquest, Edric Silvaticus, Earl of Shrewsbu and several other nobles, made formal submission to the Conqueror, but aft wards rebelled; they were all slain or taken prisoners in an engagement with king except Edric, who fled to his castle at Wigmore, where he sustaine long siege against the forces under the command of Ranulf Mortimer and Ro de Montgomery. Edric was at last compelled to surrender, and sent prisone the King; and Mortimer was rewarded with the gift of Wigmore Castle and appendages.

Through a succession of ages the Mortimer family possessed this forte together with vast estates, and became great and powerful, and by their am tion and intrigues, several of the English Monarchs were made to tremble on throne.

Roger de Mortimer was created Earl of March in the reign of Edward II. conducted the Queen and the young King, Edward III., to the Marches of Wa where he welcomed them with magnificent festivities, accompanied with tour ments and other princely recreations, at his castles at Wigmore and Ludl Roger de Mortimer was now blinded by ambition, and set no bounds to ostentation; he scarcely took pains to conceal his intimacy with the Que he usurped all the offices of government, and offended many of the nobles his haughtiness.

Mortimer was at last seized by Edward III. himself, assisted by attendan in Nottingham Castle. He was tried and condemned, and afterwards drawn Tyburn, then called Elmes, and there hung, in 1330, by the King's comma ment, for two days and two nights, "a public and gladsome spectacle."

Edmund de Mortimer, Roger's eldest son, survived his father a few years, left a son named Roger, who, in 1354, obtained a reversal of the attainder his grandfather; and it was declared in full Parliament that the charges which Roger de Mortimer had been condemned were false, and his sentence Just. He died in Burgundy in 1360, in command of the English forces in t country, and left a son Edmund, then in his minority.

Young Edmund de Mortimer was distinguished by his prudence and abilit Early in the reign of Richard II., he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which office he died in 1381. He married the Lady Philippa Plantagen daughter and heir of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, by which union he gave to descendants their title to the English Crown, the cause of so much bloodshe the following century.

In the Parliament held in the ninth year of the reign of Richard II., A 1385, his eldest son, Robert de Mortimer, fourth Earl of March, was declar heir-apparent to the crown, from his descent from Lionel, Duke of Clare His eldest daughter, Anne, was married to Richard Plantagenet, Duke of C bridge, younger son of Edmund, Duke of York, and, therefore, the great-gra son of Edward III.

REMAINS OF WIGMORE CASTLE, HEREFORDSHIRE.

After having dis guished himself in the French wars, he died childless in 1424, and the male l of this branch of the Mortimer family, with the title of Earl of March, beca extinct.

The baronies of Mortimer, and the other dignities and estates, were inher by his nephew, Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, the son of Richard, Duk Cambridge, who married his sister. This was the same Duke of York who subsequently put to death after the battle of Wakefield.

Edward IV., when Duke of York, resided at Wigmore Castle. It was gi by James I. to Thomas Harley, Esq., of Brampton Brian: this gentleman grandfather to the Lord Treasurer of that name, from whom it descended to present possessor, the Earl of Oxford.

SCENE FROM "COCKNEYS IN CALIFORNIA," AT THE ADELPHI THEATRE.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

Mr. Coyne is always on the alert for a prevailing topic, which he seizes, puts in a dramatic shape, and brings out upon the Adelphi stage before the nine days' popularity allotted to a wonder have elapsed. If there is no great care evinced in the construction or writing of these baguelles, yet they answer their ephemeral purpose admirably; and "Cockneys in California," introduced to the public on Monday, at the above house, will be no exception to the general rule. There is little or no story in it, but Mr. Paul Bedford is the emigrant master of a Gravesend steamer; Mr. Maynard is a travelling schoolmaster; Mrs. Matthews is his wife; and Mr. Mitchinson is a monkey. All these characters are found in California at the "diggings," and go through a variety of distressing adventures, until at last they determine upon returning home with a lump of gold. The farce concludes with a dance of all the nations assembled at the Sacramento, in which English, Irish, Scotch, Niggers, and Chinese each give a characteristic pas, all ultimately joining in a scramble to the tune of "Yankee Doodle." No time is allowed to the audience to think about what they are seeing; so they laugh, and applaud, and tell their friends to go, and the Adelphi is crowded.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

It is not to the sumptuous fêtes of the aristocracy, this winter, that we are indebted for the brilliancy and splendour of the Fashions at Paris, but to the numerous and elegant little evening parties which have been the type of them. At no period has the diversity of toilettes offered a more animated or charming spectacle: the ladies this year are less desirous to appear in rich dresses than to be enveloped in light diaphanous materials; thus, tulle and gauze have been very generally adopted, choosing for trimmings flowers in detached bouquets. The ribbons which last year covered the dresses, rendering them conspicuous by their various bunches, have nearly disappeared: the ruche à la chevalière, with long ends flowing on the shoulder, have alone remained in vogue.

Walking dresses are worn decidedly shorter, so as to show the chaussure, which is in exquisite taste, when accompanying a mise distinguée. Velvet is much used to trim pelisses: it is in slips on the bias (Brandebourgs), surrounded with a little blond gaillet, and joined in the centre by a small rosette of ribbon fastened at the edge, so that each rosette may appear like an œillet. A great many pelisses are worn of dark-coloured satin, brocaded with black; the ground brown, ornamented with leaves and black acanthus; or the ground deep blue, on which are wreaths of honeysuckle brocaded in shades of green, which are excessively pretty. These are closed up the front by a row of boutons de matelotade. Some are trimmed with three rows of narrow black lace, placed on each side up to the top of the skirt, and separated by a fold of velvet.

The bonnets, this spring, will certainly retain their round, wide shape, because they are so exceedingly becoming, but their size should vary according to the wearer: in the interior, quillings of blonde are much used; there are also fronts composed entirely of quillings of blond, festooned at the edge, which produces a snow-like appearance very becoming. Little caps of puffings of blond net, interspersed with little dandes or roses, are very attractive. Two wide lappets of simple tulle fall from the sides of this cap, which is placed quite on the back of the head.

Among the head-dresses, those called la Pompadour and Charlotte Corday have obtained a decided preference among very young and pretty women. The excellence and beauty of la lingerie, undoubtedly, surpasses in elegance all that has hitherto been worn.

Table-linen also participates in this marvellous improvement. In all noble houses the serviettes have in the middle a design representing the crest of the arms of their proprietor; and Flemish entoilage, guipure, and other laces are superbly employed in the trimming of house-linen.

In the group of costumes we have engraved, the in-door dress is a robe of damask satin; the promenade, a robe of satin, and velvet paletôt, trimmed with marten fur. The children wear velvet dresses, with large sleeves, and velvet capes, each with a feather; or of woollen cloth, trimmed with passementerie. The little boy wears a robe of white cachemire, embroidered with silk to match.

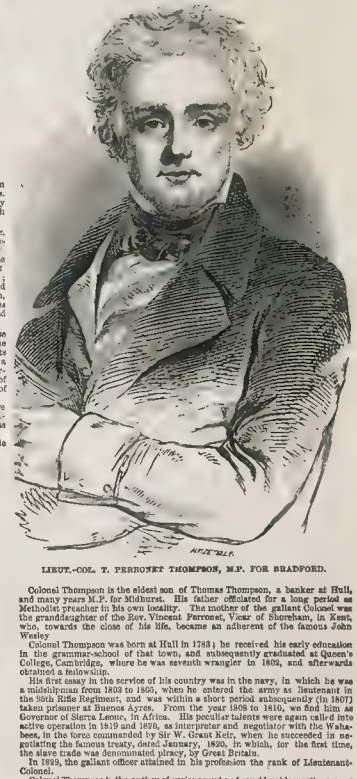
PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

COLONEL PERRONET THOMPSON.

Amongst the active band of "Radical Reformers" who have lately, and with much success, stood out in bold prominence from the great body of their party and, in contradistinction to the "Finality" men, as the uncompromising advocates of further reform in political and fiscal matters, and who now agitate with no less zeal for the attainment of a general system of economy in the taxation and financial policy of the nation at large, there is not one member who brings more earnestness and ability, or a more cultivated mind to the task to which he applies himself, in common with his collaborateurs—("the Manchester men," as they have sometimes been sneeringly called) than the gallant officer who now represents the borough of Bradford in the House of Commons. Though by no means a frequent speaker in the House, Colonel Thompson's silence does not arise from any want of tact or ability to address, with effect, the fastidious auditory that sits within St. Stephen's, but appears rather the result of choice; for his short speeches, few and far between, as they generally are, are select morceaux, when compared with the tedious dullness which some honourable gentlemen have the conscience to inflict on the drowsy complaisance of the House. The gallant Colonel, however, infinitely prefers—to "the floor of the House," or "the back benches" at Westminster, as an arena for the display of his talents—"the platform" of a public meeting, at many of which, on various occasions—particularly during the late agitation of the Anti-Corn-law League—the quaint humour and the varied information which he was in the habit of infusing into his speeches, joined with the earnestness of his manner, and the evident sincerity of his convictions, always made him one of the most welcome and popular of the speakers.



LIEUT.-COL. T. PERRONET THOMPSON, M.P. FOR BRADFORD.

Colonel Thompson is the eldest son of Thomas Thompson, a banker at Hull, and many years M.P. for Midhurst. His father officiated for a long period as Methodist preacher in his own locality. The mother of the gallant Colonel was the granddaughter of the Rev. Vincent Perronet, Vicar of Shoreham, in Kent, who, towards the close of his life, became an adherent of the famous John Wesley.

Colonel Thompson was born at Hull in 1783; he received his early education in the grammar-school of that town, and subsequently graduated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he was seventh wrangler in 1802, and afterwards obtained a fellowship.

His first essay in the service of his country was in the navy, in which he was a midshipman from 1803 to 1805, when he entered the army as lieutenant in the 95th Rifle Regiment, and was within a short period subsequently (in 1807) taken prisoner at Buenos Ayres. From the year 1808 to 1810, we find him as Governor of Sierra Leone, in Africa. His peculiar talents were again called into active operation in 1819 and 1820, as interpreter and negotiator with the Wahabees, in the force commanded by Sir W. Grant Keir, when he succeeded in negotiating the famous treaty, dated January, 1820, in which, for the first time, the slave trade was denominated piracy, by Great Britain.

In 1839, the gallant officer attained in his profession the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel.

Colonel Thompson is the author of various works of considerable merit; among them, the "True Theory of Rent," a "Catechism of the Corn-laws," and the "Mathematics of Music," are well known. He has been also a constant writer in the Westminster Review, of which he was understood to be at one time joint proprietor with Dr. Bowring. He sat for Hull from 1835 to 1837; and was an unsuccessful candidate for the representation of Preston, Maidstone, and some other places, on various occasions.

He was first returned for Bradford in 1847. In politics he is in favour of universal suffrage, and opposed to all religious endowments.

Colonel Thompson married, in 1811, Anne Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Barker, of York.

The bill provides, that any person having a conscientious objection to take an oath, may go before a magistrate and make a solemn declaration to that effect, and shall, thereupon, upon payment of a fee of 2s. 6d., receive a certificate, and be relieved from hereafter taking an oath in any Court of Justice. Provisions are also included for punishing those who make any affirmation in lieu of an oath without having made the preliminary affirmation. Persons giving false evidence after affirmation to be deemed guilty of perjury.
